Play Nowadays
is like entering another world, one with unique scenes, sounds and facts. Game play is also growing in frequency - users spend up to four hours a day playing games like Grand Theft Auto, Guitar Hero and Wii Sports [Source: Nielsen Media]. But how many players stop and think about what it entails to create these games? Video game photo gallery advertising video game makers are the creative masters behind today’s video games. Video game work requires many different talents, such as the artist’s visual imagination and the author’s storytelling skills. Finally, video game creators must possess the technical computer programming skills needed to make their vision of reality, at least in cyberspace. A video game that combines all the elements of a great story - adventure, danger, colorful and bold characters and plot - with improved computer graphics and interaction. Video game makers do their best to put players inside the game, trying to give them an intense and entertaining experience. Video game makers must push themselves in this way, as the video game market is very competitive. So how do these technically skilled, skilled creators do it? There are many programs for making video games. Video game makers are also turning to video game software, which is specially designed to facilitate the huge amount of computer software code needed to bring the game to life. Creating video games is not only fun, but it is also an increasing area. The deployment of software as a profession is expected to grow by 32 per cent by 2012. [Source: U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics]. So, what are the basics of creating a video game? What programs do you need? Read on to find out. The opinions expressed by entrepreneurs are their own. I accept that. I’ve played solitaire or mine sweeper or other game on your computer in action before. I may have felt guilty about it but imagine a workplace where this type of behavior is not resented, but is actually encouraged. After the trend of red hot games - the video game industry in the United States reached $12.5 billion in 2006 - companies across the country are assigning office areas for the sole purpose of gaming. They find that their playrooms not only help to boost employee morale and solidarity, but also help attract younger workforces and increase productivity. In fact, according to a recent survey conducted by WorldWinner, a subsidiary of FUN Technologies Inc., more than 80 percent of online players who play and off The workday said they are able to focus better on work after playing. 72 percent actually rely on game breaks to help them cope with work-related stress. Fortunately for them, gaming at work is becoming more acceptable, and in some companies, it’s the norm. If anything, we tell the staff to play more, says John Vechey, co-founder and director of PopCap games. The Seattle-based computer and video game developer allocates a full room for games. The room can be justified, because staff need to play PopCap games like Bejeweled and Zuma to make improvements and suggestions. Our employees may be working less, but they work smarter because they think about how to make games more fun, Vechey.PopCap employees say they can even play from the comfort of their own offices by joining co-workers in a multiplayer game, like Halo, on the corporate network. Vechey admits that network games can become noisy at times. I think it’s a distraction when people scream across the office, and it’s hard for people who don’t play the game, he says. But, in general, Vichy says he had no major problems. As he points out, the company’s clients are proof that on-the-job games are becoming more accepted in many different cultures in the workplace, including the convent where the 80-year-old nuns play the role of Bok Dadan and His Jelly to relax and hone their mental skills. One of the most popular reasons for having a game room, apart from business purposes, is to build office morale. The games room is not only a great recruitment tool, but it’s also the perfect place to interact with coworkers, says Scott Shamberg and Rod Rakic of Critical Mass, an interactive services company. The room is named after the cell, in reference to the hub of activity, and includes large LCD TVs, satellite TV, Dell XPS 600, iMac, Sony PSP, Xbox 360, Nintendo Wii, TiVo and more. When interviewing potential employees, Rakic and Shamberg show the view of the playroom to give them a sense of company and culture. They say the room has helped attract younger employees, although they also point out that older employees who have never been players before are also attracted to team-building events such as the 2007 Xbox NHL from calgary tourney.Aside from the social side of the games rooms, they are also a place to relax at the end of a long day. For an intellectual property lawyer at Banner & Whitkoff in Washington, D.C., the games are the perfect escape from a long and arduous work schedule. We work hard as lawyers, and we want to play hard, says Ross Danenberg, a steady shareholder and lawyer who reports on intellectual property protection in the video game industry on his blog. The company’s gaming area is located within the conference room, so lawyers must ensure that the room is free of customers and meetings before the start of game time. Some nights, lawyers keep playing. After you get home. Sometimes, five to 10 lawyers from the Washington and Chicago offices will sign up at home to play and chat. But not all the companies that have operated the gaming rooms deal specifically with games in their daily work. Take Edmunds.com, the car information site, for example. According to CO CO Ave Steinfeld, the purpose of their games room is to make the staff feel more at home. We want our employees to enjoy the human being here. The game room is a big part of who we are and who we are all. If employees want to take a break, they are encouraged to visit the room, which includes pop-a-shot basketball, arcade-style video games, a race car game suitable for the industry, and a bi-person. If the crowds become too large, the staff can expand the room by lifting the garage door which forms one of the walls of the room. Surprisingly, neither Steinfeld nor any of the other companies interviewed say they may implement any rules or regulations regarding their gaming rooms. According to Vechey, the only employees who may have a problem with this type of environment are those who cannot organize themselves. In general, however, companies agree that the positives outweigh any negatives by raising office morale, creating a positive work culture and, as a result, increasing employee productivity. Nice if you are connected in every gaming world - either through your kids or as a gaming fan yourself - you probably already know about some of the most popular trends in video games right now. But if not, us market research firm NPD has recently released its list of best-selling video games for 2020 so far. The company is looking at digital and retail sales to determine which games people buy. While some long-time family favorites are still popular, violent video games such as online multiplayer shooters are also dominant, which can be about parents. That’s why every video game comes with age rating and content from the Entertainment Rating Board, making it necessary for parents to educate themselves about these ratings, so they can select the right video games for their kids. Video games get a lot of scrutiny, but parents should keep in mind other places their children may be exposed to violence such as movies, TV and the Internet. At the end of the day, parents should make a call when it comes to their children and violent video games, says Uang Jain, co-founder of technology games company Ed SplashSplashLearn.We’ve looked at the NPD list, plus a list of best-selling games of all time from IGN, a popular video game site, to determine the best video games on the market right now. We’ve included their ratings so you can make an informed purchase if you decide to give one of these to the players in your life. Advertising - Continue reading below
