Hotmail sign in page guest

Below is a quick overview of the options you have when you work at a friend's house, for example, and you want to check your emails and log in to Hotmail as a guest. The problem, of course, is that the person who invited you may also be a Hotmail user, in which case you'll have to sign out of your Windows Live account to check your own profile! But depending on the length of your stay, the security settings of your hosts and the operating system, you'll find a few options that let you check out Hotmail! Here are a few options, which you have, depending on your situation: The simplest and most obvious choice to check your Hotmail account without leaving anyone else is to use the private browsing feature offered by most modern web browsers: it allows you to check your email messages (or any other browsing activity) without leaving traces of your visit, and in our case, you can log in to your guest computer. To sign in anonymously to your Hotmail account: If your hosts are nice and you stay as a guest long enough, they may well allow you to create your own profile on your computer, allowing you to check your emails and other online profiles and activities like Facebook without amplifying their activities! Finally, the best case scenario is when you're a guest in a family that owns a computer, but where no one is currently a Windows Live Hotmail user! In that case, you won't have a problem as you won't need to log off anyone from your email account and they won't accidentally go to your Hotmail inbox reading your emails when trying to verify your own Hotmail account! But with nearly half a billion Hotmail users in the world, the chances of this scenario happening are unfortunately quite slim! In any case, the safest way to log into a Hotmail account as a guest is to avoid checking the checkboxes that allow Windows Live to remember your username (Windows Live ID or email address) and password: in other words, don't make a web browser automatically log in to Hotmail! Hotmail privacy tip: When you're signed in to Hotmail as a guest, never forget to completely sign out and confirm that you're logged out.
