Summary Thidwick, a moose in a herd of about sixty, who lives mainly from elk moss and lives on the north shore of Lake Winna-Bango, asks a small beetle to ride on its antlers for free. The beetle takes advantage of the friendliness of the elk and settles down as a permanent resident and invites various other animals to live on and in the antlers of the elk. The good-hearted moose accepts the unexpected living conditions and treats the animals as guests, although he never explicitly told them that they are allowed to live there. Unfortunately, its passengers are thoughtless and selfish, and the situation quickly spirals out of control. When one of the guests, a woodpecker, begins to drill holes in Thidwick's antlers, the other elk thidwick issues an ultimatum: if he doesn't get rid of his guests, he leaves the herd. When Thidwick's decency forces him to forgo the comfort of herd life to pamper his guests, his flock leaves him behind. Winter is coming, and the herd swims across the lake to find fresh supplies of moose. Thidwick wants to do the same, but his guests disagree and insist thidwick should not be allowed to take their home to the far side of the lake. Even though he is starving, Thidwick refuses to go against the wishes of his guests, and he stays on the cold north shore of the lake, where his guests prefer to live. Meanwhile, the heartless inhabitants of Thidwick's antlers, who take no account of the increasing physical or psychological strain the moose has to endure, continue to invite other animals, including a 197kg black bear, to live with them. The situation culminates when a group of hunters discover and pursue Thidwick, with the aim of shooting him and mounting his head on the wall of the Harvard Club in New York City: a building known for its hunting trophies in the 1930s and 1940s. Thidwick tries to overtake the hunters, but the heavy load, including the refusal of his passengers to allow him to cross the lake, prevents him from escaping. Shortly before his capture, however, Thidwick remembers that it was time for him to shed his antlers. At the last moment he drops his antlers, makes a snide commentary to his former guests and flees by swimming across the lake to join his flock. Its former guests are captured and filled and assembled, still on his antlers, on the trophy wall of the Harvard Club. Meaning History explores borders and sharing. Neil Reynolds had discussed it as a parable on immigration issues and the welfare state. [1] Aeon J. Skoble explains Thidwick in detail as an example of the idea of property rights and, in particular, of Locke's formulation of property rights. [2] Skoble argues that Thidwick is wrong when he considers the other animals to be guests, and that history shows this. [2] In a later essay in the same volume, Henry Cribbs makes a similar point in which he ponders whether Thidwick is a case of squatter rights. [3] Shortly after the book was published, David Dempsey wrote in The New York Times: Thidwick is a masterpiece of business and a clever satire on the light mark that makes society's conventions better. The genius of history, however, lies in its finale. A man of less consistency than Seuss would have had Thidwick saved by the creatures he defends (this is the usual Disney riposte in similar situations), but Seuss's logic is rooted in principle rather than feeling, and the spongy animals get what they deserve. Incidentally, this is what the child expects. [4] Adaptations Welcome, a 1986 Soviet animated film called Thidwick the Big-Hearted Moose, a 1992 direct short film from Horton Hears a Who! Published 1948 Random House Editor Sax Comm'nin's comment to the author when he read this book: I will never stop wondering about these figs of your inexhaustible brain. SUMMARY: Thidwick roams Lake Winna-Bango with his other moose friends and looks for moose on which he can tone himself when a Bingle Bug asks if he can hop on Thidwick's antlers for a free ride. Thidwick is so generous that he says no problem and lets the bug jump up. This generosity quickly spirals out of control, as each new animal invites a different guest. The Bingle Bug tells a passing that he should join them: there is plenty of space! Laughed at the mistake. And it's free! Here's the count of the creatures that eventually gather on Thidwick's antlers: Bingle Bug Tree Spider Zinna-zo vogel Zinna-zo Zinna-zo Ms Zinna-zo bird wifre uncle (a woodpecker) Herman the Squirrel and his family Bobcat Turtle Fox Mice (the fleas bring) Bear Three hundred and sixty-two bees Thidwick is not a big fan of these unwanted guests who rip his hair, build webs and holes in his antlers, but he says: This bird, muttering Thidwick, is a kind of pest! But I'm a good sport, so I just let him rest, because above all a host has to be nice to his guest. Thidwick the Big-Hearted Moose is a picture book written and illustrated by Dr. Seuss. It was published in 1948. Thidwick the moose lets a beetle ride on its horns as it browses the grass. Unfortunately, this one act of generosity is spreading in Thidwick, which has to come to terms with a growing number of guests who are becoming increasingly annoying. Can the moose use his head to find a way out of the problem that caused his big heart? A Russian animated adaptation, Welcome was made in 1986. This book contains examples of the following tropes: Bears are bad news: One of Thidwick's last guests is a bear. Now not only is there no place in his antlers, he carries 500 pounds. Beware of the beautiful: Thidwick at the end. After being nice to his guests and receiving no help, he finally leaves them to their fate at a time of danger. He survives while his guests die. Darker and Edgier: One of the few Seuss stories in which characters actually die. Deuteragonist: Thidwick's guests share this role with Thidwick's protagonist. This is how we learn the Double Aesop. Disneyfication: Don't welcome the hunters and instead Thidwick just leaves guests dazed and confused on his discarded antlers. Double Aesop: Through Thidwick, we learn that if you let someone take advantage of your generosity, it can lead to your destruction. Through his guests we learn that if you take advantage of someone else's generosity, they could stop being generous to you. Extreme Doormat: Thidwick to its character development. Laser-Guided Karma: A Rare Seuss Comeuppance Story. Several animals exploit Thidwick and find themselves in his horns, apathetic to the discomfort it causes, and the potential for it to starve to death. He finally sheds his antlers, just as a pack of hunters pursuehim and lets him escape, and all the animals are caught on the horns and stuffed. Loophole abuse: Thidwick's guests argue that his horns are now their home and he can't move their home to the other side of the lake in the end, Thidwick realizes that this is the time of year for moose to lose their horns, so he just sats the horns off his head and says, his guests are welcome to keep them while he goes to his flock. Moose are idiots: or at least extreme doormats. Never say, Thidwick's dead guests are simply described as all stuffed. No sympathy: Thidwick's guests are apathetic apathetic the fact that he can starve, simply on the grounds that they do not want to move to the other side of the lake. Reality Ensues: Thidwick's guests can't stay on his antlers forever because he'll eventually shed them. Sacred hospitality: Thidwick endures more and more creatures on its horns without complaining just because they are guests, even though he hasn't even invited most. Stupid evil: Thidwick's guests refuse to let him emigrate, even though he becomes homeless when he dies of starvation. Surprise Creepy: Most of the book is a standard seuss story, but it ends with guests being turned into taxidermy. Advantage of generosity: The Beetle asks Thidwick if he can ride on his horns, which Thidwick allows. Then the beetle lets another guest in, and they bring in more until poor Thidwick supports a large number of animals. Moreover, they will not allow him to go with the rest of the herd to the other side of the lake so that he gets the food he needs. Teens Are Short: The tin-a-to-bird (implied to be a teenager) and the woodpecker (implying being middle-aged) are implied as the same species. Nevertheless, the woodpecker is much larger. The Thing That Would Not Leave: Thidwick lets other animals live on his horns. Unfortunately, these animals - which are prone to numbers - take advantage of its hospitality and refuse to leave. When Thidwick's herd gives him an ultimatum - get rid of them or leave the herd - he still can't lead himself to his guests and leave. Nevertheless, guests are getting bigger, inviting more guests and refusing to take into account the increasing physical and psychological stress they place on their host. When a group of hunters finally arrives at Thidwick, he decides to stand up for himself and throws off his antlers, fleeing to safety and leaving his considerate guests behind. The last page of the book shows them to taxidermy, still on the dandruff antlers. Walking spoilers: The Harvard Club hunters show up at the climax. Highlight.
