Signing up for a test, purchasing study materials, working with teachers and buying practice tests can be counted. In addition to paying for prep material, many MCAT testers also devote hundreds of hours to mastering tests that they could've used to earn money in other ways. At MCAT Self Prep, we want to not only help you succeed in mcats, but also save money. If you don't know already giving away MCAT prep materials FREE is pretty much our favorite thing to do. FREE Khan Academy Video Studies Content Khan Academy video on MCAT may be the best free resource out there. AAMC understands that some students can't afford to spend thousands of dollars on prep materials. Knowing this, they paid Khan Academy to use a free comprehensive set of videos that cover everything about MCAT. These videos are better than most, but some students prefer to pay for more condensed videos or prep books that focus on the high-yield aspects of the MCAT study. You can grab our free 100-page Khan Academy of Behavioral Science Notes here. 2. FREE diagnostic tests practice problems, although we still recommend practicing on MCAT with several full-length exams, many prep companies offer their FREE half-length exams. Two of these half length tests can be combined to create built yourself for full length exams if necessary. They can also be used as a set of practice problems with feedback on why you missed some answers. Check out our other posts for free and low cost tests. In addition, Khan Academy also put out hundreds of FREE MCAT-style snippets with detailed explanations for each You should never end up having free internship problems, but Khan Academy issues tend to be easier than actual questions about MCAT. 3. FREE JackWestin for studying CARS JackWestin has put out FREE daily CARS fragments for as long as we can remember. In addition to the FREE Khan Academy CARS excerpts that they are formatted on AAMC format, you should never run out. Their questions are a little harder than the actual AAMC CARS passages, but we recommend them to everyone. Sometimes they will write a question where most students choose the wrong answer. In that case, simply ignore the question, because it was probably poorly worded. And if you watch our Free CARS Strategy session, we'll send another 100 free CARS snippets your way! 4. FREE MCAT Self Prep for organizing your study We hope you are already using our FREE course to track your progress in learning the content of MCAT. The MCAT Self Prep website gives you YouTube playlists from various MCAT prep channels to create a comprehensive walk-through of everything about MCAT. They also have suggestions if you would rather get through the content with prep books. The cool feature is that this course integrates AAMC practice materials into mini-tests to test your progress frequently. All you have to do is sign up with your email! If that's not enough, you can access our FREE blog study tips and free daily questions by email right to your inbox! 5. FREE Software to maintain your content in long-term memory One of the most powerful tools to store a lot of information in your long-term memory is deployed in the repetition of assertiveness. Assertiveness means quizzing yourself with minimal contextual clues. The repetition of the cossy included self-reassurance at ever longer intervals. Physical cards can be great for those who are kinesthetic learners who like to write by hand. However, if you expect to make thousands of flashcards, consider creating a system to include deployed-repetition. Anki and Quizlet are free software alternatives if you don't want to save thousands of physical flashcards. Both have built-in space recurrence options. If you want to try either Anki or Quizlet, it would be worth your time to watch some YouTube tutorials to maximize the benefits of this program. 6. FREE MCAT PODCASTS For those podcast junkies out there, consider downloading some FREE podcasts to keep studying, going to work, going for a run, or washing dishes. Some of the best are the MCAT Podcast with Ryan Gray and a biology review by VanFidel. 7. FREE study group tuition from others If you know friends who are also studying for MCAT together, you can build a study group together for FREE! Head over to the FREE MCAT Self Prep Facebook Study Group Learn from other perspectives and each other lessons about about biochemistry, and more. Or try to work with CARS passages together to learn how to correct your common mistakes. This is a great low cost alternative to private/group training sessions.
