Richard Perry / The New York TimesConditions for Ninth Avenue and the corner of West 41th Street are incredible, you-gotta-be-kidding quality, such as free beer or affordable housing - 99¢ Fresh Pizza. Like many things in New York, they are also too good to be true. They are not a penny, as one piece actually costs one dollar. Seven days a week, 24 hours a day, New York city stand outdoors 99¢ Fresh Pizza and pay as much for a simple piece as they did at the price of the subway in 1986. For a $1.50 use fee A.T.M. is more expensive nearby. This is a city with a 10.4 percent unemployment rate in January, it is a recession, there is no such thing as a change that is spare. Customers, given their word signs, have been known to ask for a penny back after paying with a dollar bill. I give them a penny, explained Mohammad Hossain, a manager at a pizza shop. No pennies change hands one block down Ninth Avenue, West 40th Street, where the competition posted signs of its own: Pizza, $1.00 per piece, tax included. Postal workers, teens and entrepreneurs step into 24 hours of 2 Bros Pizza, $5 bills in hand. Fidelity has formed. The trash can was talked about. Cabdriver said it preferred 99¢ Fresh. 2 Bros patron prefers his sauce over the sauce to the block. Each company has the same daily special: Two slices and soda can for $2.75, which is what most places charge for one piece. There are indoor seats at 2 Bros., but none at 2 Bros. Asked what opened first, mr. Hossain was adamant, perhaps even offended: This is the first! This is the first! In New York, a domain $1,000 omelet (Norma's, at Le Parker Meridien Hotel) and a $41 burger (Old Homestead Steakhouse), dollar wars between 99¢ Fresh and 2 Bros. is an unlikely development. 2 Bros. Pizza on 40th Street and Ninth Avenue. For people wanting to splurge, two slices and soda are available for $2.75Credit... Richard Perry/The New York Times Stores are two growing new York city delis and a pizzeria offering $1 slices, a phenomenon that has cheered, alarmed and disturbed pizza lovers, food bloggers and rival pizzeria owners, while ignoring the city's basic economy - charging as much as you can, when and where you can. About 15 eateries around the city now sell dollar-sliced pizza. The 99¢ Fresh and 2 Bros owners turned bargain pizza into a business model: There are four 99¢ fresh stores in Manhattan, and four 2 Bros as well. Next month, 99¢ fresh will open its fifth store on 34th Street near Third Avenue. While the dollar menu has become a staple of many fast food restaurants around. Pizza experts said the rise of dollar pizza was an economic-driven counterattack for New York's more celebrated high-end pizza. Last year, Di Fara Pizza in Brooklyn, widely regarded as one of the best in the city because each pie is the owner's handmade using imported ingredients from Italy, raised the price of a simple piece to $5. I don't think a drunk college student cares if there are San Marzano tomatoes on their piece, Jason Feirman, 25, who writes a pizza blog I Dream of Pizza, said the trend about a $1 pizza. It's a good business model. They are not catering to food blogs. The idea is to turn out for these pizzas as fast as they can. Theories abound as to how a company can sell such cheap food in such an expensive city. Dollar pizza shops have been accused of using frozen dough, skimping on cheese and sauce and cutting slices too low. I think it's great for people who aren't interested in a high-quality product, said Margaret Mieles, Di Fara's manager, a dollar piece of institutions. The owners of 2 Bros. and 99¢ Fresh claim that their slices are fresh with quality ingredients and that they produce their dough and their own pizza sauce. They describe the dollar-cut business as a kind of public service with minimal profit margins. In 2008, when the first 2 Bros Pizza opened in St. Marks Place in the East Village, the owners decided to make a grand-opening dollar piece special. It was so popular, they made it permanent. How good is pizza dollar piece locations in town? It's nothing fancy, but few customers have any complaints. Credit... Richard Perry/The New York Times Financially, it doesn't make much sense, but it's part of our brand, Eli Halali, 26, one of two brothers who shared his 2 Bros Pizza, said as he stood next to bags of General Mills enriched flour in an East Village store. Abdul Mohammad, owner of the 99¢ Fresh chain, said there was no secret to his formula. Its shops are located in small spaces with a small bike for pedestrian-heavy places that can support 400 pie a day. If I sell like 20 pies, 30 pies, I can't pay rent, pay the workers, he said. My rent is cheap. If I pay $15,000 to $20,000 in rent, I can't make dollar slices. He said he made a profit of around 15 cents to 20 cents per piece and that it was not uncommon for one 99¢ fresh place to produce up to 450 cakes per day. His pizza is so cheap, some customers treat him like a wholesaler, order dozens of cakes in the morning and sell slices elsewhere - for $2 each. At lunchtime the next day, 13 men and women stood on the sidewalk at 99¢ Fresh on Ninth Avenue and 41st Street. eagerly ordered and eagerly eaten sliced between the atmosphere of the ungented Hell's Kitchen: an idle delivery truck near the back of the Port Authority bus terminal, a bark dog named Leo someone tied down the block, a prostitute who rushed to say something for about $150 for half an hour and a bearded homeless man with a scanner who spoke loudly to himself about the medium size He ate in two splits. Some rave about sliced into two chains, saying that they are just as good or better than more expensive slices, while others are just a little impressed, or flat out unspoiling, no one complains about the price. Last April, Adam Kuban, 35, 35, editor SeriousEats.com and the founder of pizza blog Slice, had what he called a cheap piece of showdown between 99¢ Fresh and 2 Bros. Partly because of its better hole in the structure of the crust, mr. Kuban announced 2 Bros as the winner. Mr. Feirman's Dream of Pizza would have voted differently, with 99¢ Fresh being his choice. Is this the best pizza out there? It's not, mr. Kuban said in an interview, referring to both 99¢ Fresh and 2 Bros. But someone who just wants bread and sauce and cheese, will make you right. For the inspiration of the trend, said Mr. Mohammad, considered a dollar piece trailblazer, was not a cabbie, tourist or late-night drinker in Hell's Kitchen, but another demographic entirely: the homeless, who used a 24-hour drop-in center on Ninth Avenue and 41st Street. If they want to buy Chinese food, they need $4, Mr. Mohammad said. For a piece it is $2.50. I'm thinking about these people. I say, I want to do something for these people. Fue nuestro lugar favorito para desayunar, comer, cenar. En NY siempre estás gueriendo aprovechar cada segundo y lugares como estos ayudan demasiado para comer rico, fresco y mega barato. La pizza siempre nos tocó recién salida del horno y nunca esperamos más de 5 minutos... para tener pizza en nuestras manos. Más manos. Másas
