Online student enrollment is in steady decline and currently sits at levels that are half what they were just five years ago. The following are a sharp decrease in revenue and unhappy shareholders, despite the rather sublime attitude of the company and the management of the school. The university itself, which is part of the Apollo Education Group, has made a murder as a provider of higher education online before, well, the rest of the world caught up. But, with its latest earnings data recently released by Apollo, it's clear that the platform could be subject to its primary. While we face challenges in the second quarter, we believe the Apollo Education Group is in the right long-term strategy, said Greg Capelli, chief executive of Apollo Egsthnmstm Group, in a press release. At a time of unprecedented change in higher education, we focus on improving outcomes through a deep understanding of the needs of students and employers. This includes differentiating the University of Phoenix through its program-based colleges and diversifying our organization with the expansion of Apollo Global and other targeted growth initiatives. Despite Capelli's enthusiasm, the numbers aren't pretty. And revenue and enrollment are down about 14% from this time last year, and Apollo's stock has fallen 30% since the data was released, according to CNN. Right, things are bleak. But the truth is, the University of Phoenix, and others like him, have been marked for death for some time. For-profit colleges and online educators like U of P at one point had an effective monopoly on online education, but this simply is no longer the case. For a company offering lower product quality at an inflated price, it is quite clear that the management of these types of companies is probably at the end. Source: University of Phoenix Official Page in Phoenix The most obvious problem for Apollo and its competitors is that traditional public and private universities are catching up with them. When the University of Phoenix first entered the internet and became a new option for prospective students across the country, they had a new and sought-after product that could be accessed from anywhere to anyone, breaking down the two biggest barriers to college education for most people. This, in turn, allowed them to charge heavily inflated prices for training. Through some fantastic funging and manipulation, U of P and its inc. millions in take out huge loans through the government to pay for their education and use taxpayer dollars to increase their profits. These practices lead to a snub in the public domain, a few less than flattering investigative documentaries and a general agreement among many employers that education by nature is less than those of a traditional school. Essentially, these schools will give degrees to anyone willing to pay for it, rather than through achievement and merit-based programs used by traditional colleges. But simply comparing the numbers from a standard public four-year university with a university program in Phoenix shows the real problem. According to the College Affordability and Transparency Center, part of the Department of Education, the University of Phoenix costs $14,550 a year to attend, and has a 19% graduation rate. While public universities aren't much cheaper these days, on average around the same price, they have a much better experience of graduating their students, about 57%, and putting them into jobs afterwards. Now that most major colleges have their own online programs, there is no incentive for a future student to choose the University of Phoenix over one of the public, or even more expensive but prestigious private university. Ultimately, the Apollo Group apparently helped invest in naming an NFL football stadium after the organization, rather than reinvesting in improving its platform. With all this in view, it's time to worry if you're part of the Apollo system. To compete, some big changes will have to be made, and it is unclear whether the business model can cope with these changes. Other similar companies are already closed, and the latest numbers may be the first sign that the University of Phoenix will fail. And once this Phoenix bite the dust, there's probably no hope of resurrection. More from Business Cheat Sheet: Want more great content like this? When deciding what to pack for Phoenix, be sure to think about your season and activities. These 10 items should be on each traveler's list when considering what to pack for Phoenix. Multiple water bottle KieferPix / Shutterstock Because the desert is so dry, you will need to drink more water than usual to stay hydrated. Even Phoenixians bring bottles of water wherever they go. Pack a reusable bottle and store it with you – regularly throughout the day – while you are in Phoenix. Antonio Gillem/Shutterstock Sun in Phoenix can be intense, especially in summer. Avoid burning by wearing sunscreen at least with SPF 30. To reduce the risk of skin cancer, your sunscreen must contain either ecamsule, avobenzone, oxybenzone, titanium dioxide or zinc oxide. If you're going to be in the pool, make sure your sunscreen is waterproof too. Balm for your lips can burn just as easily as the skin of any other part of your body. Protect them and keep them hydrated with a UV protection lip plug in your travel bag. Lip balm can relieve lips cracked by dry air and dehydration, the dry heat of Olga Miltsova/Shutterstock Phoenix equals dry skin. Invest in a moisturiser with ingredients such as hyaluronic acid or dimethicone that help your skin to hydrate. Lanolin, mineral oil and Vaseline, lock in the moisture that's already there. Restoring drops for prisonDivision/Sstopolo Can dry your eyes if you are not used to it. When considering what to pack for Phoenix, do not recovery of the drops, especially if the contact lenses. Eyes that blow dust and sand can annoy the eyes of contact wearers. If you wear lenses, wear your glasses. On windy days, you may want to swap your contacts for your glasses. You may also want to have a pair of glasses, comfortable in case dry air makes your contacts annoy your eyes. The hair ties Zvyagintsev Sergei/Shutterstock Long hair can get hot in summer and can be obtained along the way when walking, mountain biking or horseback riding. Keep your neck cool and hair out of your eyes with hair ties you brought from home. Hat with a deciduous head MANDY GODBEHEAR / Shutterstock If you plan to spend some time outside in Phoenix, pack a wide hat that will protect your ears and neck, not just your face. Wear it while longing by the pool, walking through the desert or standing in the sun. Amazon Digital Camera Your phone's camera is good for selfies in the pool, but to capture the amazing sunsets of Phoenix or the view in the Grand Canyon, you'll be happy to have a digital camera. If you're a thrill seeker, you may want to pack a GoPro. Compact umbrella It may sound silly to pack an umbrella for a trip to the desert, but during the monsoon season from mid-July to mid-September, Phoenix can get intense afternoon storms. Come prepared by inserting a compact umbrella into your luggage.
