

I'm not robot  reCAPTCHA

Continue

Bally's lifetime membership

I just sent a letter to the regional VP threatening to initiate a class-action lawsuit. Wondering how much is out there in a similar situation. Some easy Google search suggests it's a problem for Bali's friends all over the country. Also, wondering if someone who would get the override came across an easier way to get your existing membership transferred. Apparently Los Angeles Fitness has changed its policy a million times and applied it consistently even amid a similar situation to Bali's friends. I'd rather fix it just than become a raging lunatic if it seems possible. The current position for people like me (as of this morning, as far as I can tell) is that if you are a lifelong member of Bali, with nationwide rights to use the chain, if you originally joined one of the clubs not acquired by LA Fitness, even if the club you joined no longer exists and you had a nationwide membership that tied you to the club no one they would respect your membership., contrary to the statement currently on their website. I understand this issue will be meaningless to those it doesn't affect, but I just thought there might be others like me out there. Discussing exactly what the problem is? What exactly is the problem? Sounds like LA Fitness has acquired some, but not all of them, Bally's locations and promised all of Bally's lifelong friends a los angeles fitness membership. Sounds like LA Fitness has acquired some, but not all of them, Bally's locations and promised all of Bally's lifelong friends a los angeles fitness membership. In fact, it sounds like the problem is they didn't promise all of Bali's lifelong friends fit girlfriends in Los Angeles. What exactly is the problem? Los Angeles Fitness has taken over certain locations, but not all. Unlike previous acquisitions - in my case, Holiday's acquisition of Jack Len and the acquisition of Holiday - the deal was dubbed the acquisition of assets in which only certain rights relating to some of Bali's previous locations were acquired. So instead of simply taking full rights and obligations of the previous corporate contracts, they decided to choose and choose. So they tell me and others like me that I'm still a full member of Bali - it's just that the nearest location to me is now hundreds of miles away in Norfolk. And if I want to join fitness in L.A. to keep going to the club I've been going to for many years, I need to join as a new member just like everyone else off the street. As it happens, of course, I have a Bali membership that allows me to use every club all over the country and pay $60 a year for life. It's shocking that L.A. Fitness will decide not to honor the friendship. I wouldn't respect it either if I were them. You're in the same position you'd be if Bali had erred your leg. I wouldn't respect it either if I were them. You're in. You'd be if Bali went to business. But Bali has benefited from the sale of places that are an intrinsic part of the promise they made to me and others like me. That's what it's all about. They're not out of the business. Yes, L.A. Fitness shouldn't respect that, but I think there's a reasonable chance of a lawsuit against Bally's (in accordance with the terms and conditions of the lifetime membership). But Bali has benefited from the sale of places that are an intrinsic part of the promise they made to me and others like me. That's what it's all about. They're not out of the business. What does this have to do with LAF? Wait, a health club with disgusting business practices? What does this have to do with LAF? Well, true, the claim is probably the most obvious aimed at Bali's but LAF is undoubtedly derived some benefit from Bali's name and goodwill and the fact that Bali's friends are more likely to want to keep going to the gym they're going to than start looking elsewhere, so they derive some lingering benefit from the relationship Bali's established with her former friends. Not sure if a lawsuit would stick against them, but if you were thinking about a lawsuit, you'd almost certainly want to join them as well. What does your agreement mean if Bali places a club so it's no longer within a certain radius of you? What does your agreement mean if Bali places a club so it's no longer within a certain radius of you? I last read it a week ago so I can't remember the top of my head, but I believe the apply clause went to allow me to use another club in the area if my specific location was closed and not what would have happened if no replacements were available. Of course, it was a Jack Lan contract, assuming the overhead, assuming Bali's. I'm not sure what Bali's current contract means or if it will override my old contract. But I would think that matter of common sense, you can't sell 170+ locations, get money from the purchaser of those locations and then get your hands up and tell good earthly friends, we no longer serve these areas, sorry. Would there even be a supportive consideration of the contract if you could close, say, all but one club nationwide after selling memberships on the basis of providing access to a string of Vanderides? Bali's I Belong (Wheaton - come on, doing your jokes) was purchased by Los Angeles Fitness in December. It's much nicer and professionally managed now. They carried my rate at $20 a month. I'm pretty happy with the change. But at the same time I can't imagine there are so many people holding Jack Lan's contract for life these days. They've been gone at least 20 years. And thanks to the Irish for the word L.A. Fitness running things well. There are five blocks of Bali where my house is and although prices have always been great, I avoided joining them because I heard horror stories. Between that and I have a really nice L.A. fitness close to my job, I'm going to take a second look at them.sgii, I feel sorry for you, but at the same time I can't imagine there are so many people holding a lifetime fitness contract for Jack LaLanne these days. I remember the holiday spa from when I was a little kid, and I'm 38. They've been gone at least 20 years, haven't they? And thanks to the Irish for the word L.A. Fitness running things well. There are five blocks of Bali where my house is and although prices have always been great, I avoided joining them because I heard horror stories. Between that and having a really nice L.A. fitness close to my job, I'm going to take a second look at them. You live in the D.C. area? I thought L.A. Fitness had taken over all the local clubs. As for the difference between the two, I can say that since LA Fitness took over my location it was almost exactly the same, with many of the same staff, no new equipment, no new design or other services. Although that may change. And despite my current complaint, my experience with Bali has always been fine: it's cheaper, no more and no less crowded and no less well stocked than the many more expensive places I've been to, though obviously not velvety. If you can live with receptionists to open the door late if you're there early and trying to get in a quick workout, or a little slow with getting permanent broken gear it's not bad.sgii: thankfully, I was able to move my girlfriends, however, my fiancé didn't. She learned yesterday morning that she could no longer use Bali's gym (currently LAF) b/c her membership had not been moved. Her membership was not transferred to the gym b/c that I purchased (later transferred to her) and the companies (in New York) were not purchased by LAF. Despite the fact that she never used Bali' of New York and exclusively used Bali's MD, her membership was not transferred. It's annoying that Bali didn't even text her to cancel or continue with her friends in Bali. She contacted Bali yesterday and they said the membership could be moved with a month by changing her home gym; Today, her home gym is listed as new york's gym. It's interesting when I transferred my friendship to her, this process was handled by Bali's at MD, she got her ID at Meda's gym, gave the MD gym her credit card details, and it's the MD gym that charged her too much for nearly $300. Bali has the worst customer service, so, I'm not sure how much I believe the transfer guarantee. I feel sorry for you and hope things turn out. L.A. Fitness is pretty cheap to begin with. Not a lifelong ballys cheap friend, but still Just go in and try to work out a deal with the GM clubs. January is obviously not the best month to negotiate with a health club, but I'm sure they'll work with you. You might end up paying a little more, but as the Irishman mentioned it would be at a much nicer club. Fortunately, I managed to move my friendship, however, my fiancé did not. She learned yesterday morning that she could no longer use Bali's gym (currently LAF) b/c her membership had not been moved. Her membership was not transferred to the gym b/c that I purchased (later transferred to her) and the companies (in New York) were not purchased by LAF. Despite the fact that she never used Bali' of New York and exclusively used Bali's MD, her membership was not transferred. It's annoying that Bali didn't even text her to cancel or continue with her friends in Bali. She contacted Bali yesterday and they said the membership could be moved with a month by changing her home gym; Today, her home gym is listed as new york's gym. It's interesting when I transferred my friendship to her, this process was handled by Bali's at MD, she got her ID at Meda's gym, gave the MD gym her credit card details, and it's the MD gym that charged her too much for nearly $300. Bali has the worst customer service, so, I'm not sure how much I believe the transfer guarantee. I feel sorry for you and hope things turn out. yes, sounds like my situation, or a version of it. I tried to move my friendship and the latter is that L.A. Fitness has decided not to accept such transfers, so it's not the end of Bally's that's the problem starting at this moment, even though the stories change daily. Being an unemployed lawyer, I have some time and background to try to deal with it with possible additional coercion power. Not sure how it's going to turn out, but I'll let you know if I get any results, and if so, how I did it. You live in the D.C. area? I thought L.A. Fitness had taken over all the local clubs. yes, I live in Washington, D.C. Works in Pentagon City. At the L.A. fitness site, they're pyming the DC clubs with (Ballys) next to them, so they may not have replaced them yet. yes, I live in Washington, D.C. Works in Pentagon City. At the L.A. fitness site, they're pyming the DC clubs with (Ballys) next to them, so they may not have replaced them yet. No, they've all been replaced. They only point out who was of Bali because they offer former members of Bali the chance to switch, but only if they only use the clubs of the former Bali (unless, of course, they pay an extra fee). I work for the Pentagon City Club. It's actually okay, so if you have one too close home it'll work for you. You.