As the code consists, Visual Studio compiles out of sight with the ultimate goal of providing input about sentence structures and collecting errors that are celebrated with red wavy underlines. The application is separated by a green underline. Foundation aggregation does not produce executable code because it requires an unexpected compiler compared to the compiler used to create executable code. Breakpoints can be restrictive, which means they are activated when a condition is met. The code can run one line (source code) at any given time. This can either venture into the capacity to solve problems inside or the business above it. Running the capacity body is not accessible for manual inspection. The debugger supports edit and continue, i.e. When troubleshooting, if the mouse pointer floats above any factor, its current account is displayed in the label (informational labels), where it can also be edited whenever needed. On the off probability that the source code for the running procedure is accessible, the code appears at startup. If the source code is not accessible, it may display disassembly.
