Air canada carry on allowance

In recent weeks we have seen some airlines change their transportation policies for worse – in particular, Spirit and WOW Air come to mind. Well, it's nice to see an airline change their transportation policy for the better for once. Air Canada has just removed their weight restriction for carry-ons. Specifically, their new policy is as follows: Hand luggage must be easy enough to store it in the unassisted trash can. Previously Air Canada's carry-on weight limit was 10kg or 22lbs. Personally I am very happy to see this change. Most airlines have unrealistically low weight limits for their conveyor scarreports. For example, the weight limit of Singapore Airlines is 7 kg per aircraft baggage, even in Class Suites. Many single carry bags weighing 4-5kg naked, which means that you can barely put anything in the bags if you want them to be technically legal. Fortunately, these limits are usually not implemented, and we have never had a problem carrying two or three times more on a plane (wise weight). I think Air Canada's policy of asking that you be able to pick up your bag is smart. I realize that sounds like and might be unfair to those who aren't as apt-bodied, although any other system creates a difficult situation: At many airlines, the crew is not allowed to pick up passengers' luggage for them, for reasons of liability While foreigners will often help, relying on the kindness of strangers seems like a bad system However, the only reason this rule surprises me a bit is because overhead bins have usually posted weight limits. Now passengers can theoretically carry-on 30-40 pound carry-ons, and if you stack those next to each other, you can easily exceed the weight limit posted by a director. I don't actually see that being a safety issue, but I'm surprised that I'm not technically publishing rules that would at least theoretically prevent this. I hope other airlines follow the air canada lead! What do you think of Air Canada removing a shipping weight limit? You can bring your own approved Personal Oxygen Concentrator (POC) on board (along with enough battery power for 1.5 times total travel time), or purchase Air Canada's Oxygen Medipak Air Canada Medical Assistance Desk service. There are a few exceptions. The Medipak service is not available on Beechcraft 1900D (BEH) aircraft operated by Air Georgian and Exploits Valley Air. If you're traveling with one of the code sharing partners, visit their website to learn more about their special service policies. Also note that preserved oxygen (also known as recreational or flavoured oxygen) is not accepted in checked or hand luggage. Whether you choose to bring your own POC or purchase Medipak Air Canada Oxygen Service, you will need to obtain medical approval for your trip and provide 48 hours' notice prior to your trip, regardless of destination*, by contacting the Air Canada HealthCare Office.
