I'm assuming we all strive to be the best we possibly can. Working in a fast-paced environment at BKWLD, our team of developers will learn to adapt at the moment to meet the deadline, Most of us want to arrive a little more quickly. I'm often forced to attempt to stradd out a line between doing something well and doing it quickly. Hopefully these can to be achieved, which is sometimes true. More often than not, though, I'm forced to lean more on one side, either choosing to make something clean and beautiful, or something that's accomplished when the customer needs it. Black Friday Deals: See all the best offers right now! Which approach is better? Our technical director, Justin Zwett, summed it up excellently when he told me: We need fewer killers and more street fighters. Jewett explains that we need people that can code quickly, roll with punches and work the best is possible — something that's particularly difficult when things get hot and are less than customer-friendly. This has led to a number of in-depth discussions about which approach is correct. Poetry is good there is a reason to be considered a form of good code poetry. It's elegant, clean, easy to read, and fun to write. These are all extraordinary qualities that we must strive for every single day. This approach is philosophically correct. If the code is well structured from the start, then late in the game, things are easy to find and edit. For example, it's good practice to create a JavaScript file to capture all config-level variables, making things like animation speed and delay period later become an air. Speed goodspeed is often overlooked and/or overlooked. The simple way of working is often seen as bad or amateur. Shortcuts and hacks are further frowned upon, and their practitioners are considered bad developers by the community. I am a proponent of rapid development for several reasons, of which major things are happening at the time - or quickly. This leaves more room for polishing, and can make both producers and customers very happy. Creating a framework that fits nothing does undoubtedly speed up growth and makes things faster, but everything fits a clean, packed conference. There are times when a simple image tag, table, or even (dare I dare say it?) is a quick solution to a problem that will take longer to build using standards or some new innovative workflow. I've worked on sites that were very complicated for their need and context. Not everything requires a minifid contified script with complex environments, Python frameworks, or cache-busting hashs. All those things need to take their place for specific projects, but to take a good dev and choose what is best for the scope of the project, rather than just use the most complex technology in all respects. Find out what's right for the project when considering the project you're working on, think about what the requirements are and where most of the time should be spent. For example, if the site doesn't need complex JavaScript, don't add script-loading frameworks and modules that will take time and energy to install. Instead, a simple script file or even some inline JavaScript will work fine. That way Have been mixed and you can spend more time on the rest of the site. If the project is a personal one you're intensely passionate about, spend all the time when you want to make sure that every line of code is where it should be and it's reduced to its cleanest possible. If the project is for a three-month campaign that should be completed next week, the shortest route to the finish line is probably the best. I've only been a developer for five years, and 95 percent of my professional projects are later. We need to complete the quality work in the shortest time.
