Another word for relationship building

The question arises whether anyone's existing online network or employee could be part of the evaluation process. The following are my favorite responses: Kat French (Guest Moderator: Personal and Professional Separate in Social Media.Or not): Employers need to be clear if the benefits of your personal network expect a new hire. Denise Jenders (#sm132 Active Partner): In the digital world, I think it's believed that social networks will be used to evaluate you. Jason Breed (co-founder #socialmedia): What I've seen: Personal social brands get you hired, but an employee's social network isn't yet considered as part of the promotion process. In moving relationship building in the social media sector (from personal connections to organizational PR), I think it could prove to be a bonus or a tremendous incentive for promotion: to create and help build a formal, long-term relationship with a stakeholder first met online. Will it not be incredibly relevant and satisfactory in merging the PR and social media sectors of practice in this way - even if the bulk of discussions and arrangements are abolished and developed quietly among the relevant decision-makers in a position of influence and authority? Not a bad thing is on your CV, either.
