And while higher-quality schools are usually accompanied by higher property taxes, homeowners in such neighborhoods eventually repay the sale price through higher homes. How does the return sound great, but how much do we talk about? New research from Realtor.com shows that in order to get to the preferred school district, 9% of buyers say they would pay 11% to 20% above the budget. Separately, 17% report they want to pay extra to be close enough for their children to walk to and from school. Related: 7 renovation tips to increase the resale valueSecond between amenities for adults and educational children you'll guess: children win. Realtor.com found that 62% of buyers would pass a home spa if it meant getting into the right school district. 50% would admit easy access to shopping, while 44% would give up space in the form of a bonus room. If the house you plan to sell is a much coveted school district, do everything in your power to emphasize this fact in all your real estate marketing materials. Many potential buyers are parents of children currently in the school system, so make sure to get the word between neighbors and local friends. If you buy a home, use the search tool that allows you to filter by school district, because the boundaries of the district are not always in tune with city, rural and urban lines. After all, you can't assume that your children will be assigned to attend the same school as the kids down the block or even next door. Armstrong Roberts/ClassicStock/ArchivePhotos/Getty Images To find a school district associated with any home address in the United States, go to GreatSchools.org, and enter the address on the interactive school district and boundary map. Then find the name of the school district to get the district's phone number and call the district to confirm. Visit the GreatSchools.org to get the name of the district, visit the district's website. Many public school districts have interactive school finders that allow families to enter their home address and get a list of relevant primary, secondary and higher education institutions. At least most maps showing the boundaries of the area. It is useful to take this step, because the school district's attendance areas can go from year to year, so information is collected from neighbors, brokers and others sources may be inaccurate. In addition, most state have lists of each state district arranged in alphabetical order by name or by district number and often have maps showing the boundaries of each district. Here you can also find district demographics, average test results, school evaluations, and other useful information. As a final confirmatory step, call the school district office and ask to speak to a enrollment specialist to help you find the right school for each child in the family. Hero Images/Getty Images One of the upsides of high school attendance is the ability to engage in student government, or other leadership roles. If your tween is thinking about running a student board, it's good to know a little bit about the work she can be elected to do. Let's explore some of the positions high school officials may have to be able to help your tween know what to expect and make a decision. Keep in mind that these responsibilities may vary from school to school, although they are generally similar. A high school class president often has more responsibility than other officials. This is an interesting and challenging position, and it provides an excellent opportunity to develop leadership and social skills. The president presides over all government meetings and works closely with the school administration and parent boosters. The President shall also ensure that other officials in the class perform their duties and duties. In addition, the class president can represent a school outside the school, such as school board meetings or the community. The Vice-President is responsible for taking over the office of president if they are unable to resign as a result of the relocation or replacement of the school. This also means that the Vice President can oversee meetings or functions if the president is outside the city or sick of school. In addition, the vice president is often responsible for decorating the functions of the school. They can also recruit volunteers and delegate responsibility to voluntary committees. Because of the diversity of assignments, students who enjoy both leadership roles and have good organizational skills are a great vice-president candidate. The primary responsibility of the class secretary is to monitor the records or minutes of meetings, functions, projects and activities. This is a good place for students who are comprehensively oriented, organized, and well communicating. Secretaries also tend to be responsible for transmitting news to the student body, boosters, sponsors and school administration. If the student government sends news, the secretary will most likely be responsible for this activity. The class treasurer is responsible for class money. Students who are interested in money management and who are organized to be the great candidates for treasurer. Treasurers shall ensure that class projects or remain in the class budget and that all accounts are paid and accounted for. The Treasurer also keeps records of financial transactions and transfers the budget and account balance to the administration and other class members. The class historian is responsible for documenting the year of shooting, writing stories in the school newspaper, and creating scrapbook class activities, functions, milestones, etc. Class historian also attends government meetings and supports other student government members. If your student shows an interest in journalism or photography, this may be a good fit. In addition to student government officials, various committees can help plan and perform various functions or activities throughout the year. For example, some schools have a decorating committee, a food committee or an activity committee. Volunteering on the committee is perfect for tweens who want to participate but are not ready to take office. This is also a great way for children who are busy with other activities to participate in student government. If your child feels student government interest it's a good idea to promote it. Engagement gives your child the opportunity to learn how government works and make a difference in their school. It's also a great way to learn leadership skills and learn how to work with others. All these skills can be quite useful in the future. Thank you for your feedback! What are your concerns?
