Introduction to Nursing Theories and Models Theories provide a design or framework from which to view the practice. Such theories and related models can be useful for understanding patient behavior and giving guidance in the development of appropriate nursing interventions. In this chapter, some important nursing theories will be summarized, including those from King, Roy, Rogers, Neuman, and Orem. Rehabilitation nurses provide medical care and rehabilitation assistance to patients dealing with long-term injuries, disabilities and/or illnesses. Because rehabilitation is a long and sometimes intensive process, these nurses often form strong, long-term relationships with the patients they help. Rehabilitation nurses educate patients about their medical condition, develop short- and long-term rehabilitation strategies and targets to help patients recover safely and as soon as possible, provide family members with advice on how to properly care for people in need of long-term rehabilitation care, administer medications, monitor vital signs and monitor patients' recovery among a range of other procedures that focus on Rehabilitation nurses can work in various areas, such as: Sports Rehabilitation Rehabilitation Programs Related to Injuries Help Disability Prevention and Rehabilitation Units Heart Disease & Rehabilitation of Cardiovascular Disease Rehabilitation Cancer Treatment Cancer Treatment Nurse Advocacy Nursing Research And a number of other careers related to rehabilitation of care and education. Because the rehabilitation process requires rehabilitation nurses to be highly educated, well-educated, and patient-focused, most employers who hire hire Nurses require these nurses to have several years of experience as a registered nurse (RN) in nursing rehabilitation, and many cases may also require RN to have at least one BSN degree in nursing. After working in nursing rehabilitation for a sufficient period of time, registered nurses can apply to receive the certified rehabilitation registered nursing examination to earn their certification and begin their career as a certified rehabilitation nurse. After obtaining certification, registered nurses can then start looking for work as a certified rehabilitation nurse. CNA, LPNs, and LVNs can also work in rehabilitation care; However, their training and expertise often limit the type of care they can provide to patients in need of advanced rehabilitation care. In terms of work atmosphere, rehabilitation nurses can be found working in various settings such as nursing homes, patient home care, hospitals, rehabilitation clinics, long-term health care clinics, and a number of other healthcare facilities focused on rehabilitation. Rehabilitation Nursing is an ever-evolving sector that constantly offers nurses new ways to improve their patient care, so that rehabilitation nurses need to stay on top of current health care trends, new technology, and evolving healthcare processes if they want to provide the best possible care. Possible.
