Act test dates 2020 mississippi

The new coronavirus has a huge impact on colleges, and this includes college admissions. Because of home-based bookings, virtual learning, and canceled SAT and ACT exam dates, among other things, many universities know that it can be difficult or impossible for incoming high school students to take and do well on standardized tests in time for filing deadlines. The result? Hundreds of colleges have abandoned their sat and ACT test requirements for the 2020/2021 college admission cycle. Which schools canceled exams? Will they reinstate these test requirements next year? If you are able to take the test, should you still submit your scores? This guide covers all of these issues. Which colleges do not require SAT/ACT results for 2020/2021 College Admissions? Below is a chart of all colleges and universities in the United States that no longer require SAT/ACT scores for any applicants for the 2020/2021 admission cycle as a result of coronavirus. Some notable inclusions are the UCLA system, all Ivy League schools, most public Ivies, and top liberal colleges like Williams, Amherst, Wellesley, Swarthmore, and Middlebury. Please note that this list only includes colleges that have become optional as a result of coronavirus; colleges that were already testing optional before the pandemic are listed here. Also note that this list only includes schools that reduce the SAT/ACT requirement. Some schools still require SAT/ACT, but reduced requirements for SAT subject tests and AP tests for applicants this year. Others have waived SAT/ACT requirements but still have TOEFL requirements for international students. Some schools, such as Tufts University and Trinity University, use this as a probationary period, and will keep their test-optional policy for three years before deciding whether to implement it on a permanent basis or not. Other schools, such as the University of Oregon and Scripps College, have announced that they have decided to become permanently tested optional starting in the 2020/2021 admission cycle. However, most schools do not undertake whether they continue their tests of optional policies after the end of the pandemic. What we do know, however, is that more and more schools are becoming testing optional. Colleges are making an effort to attract more diverse applicants, and they don't want potential students to be held up by circumstances beyond their control, whether test centers are closing due to coronavirus or students unable to afford standardized tests, even in non-pandemic In addition, studies have shown that students from wealthier backgrounds consistently have higher SAT and ACT scores, so many schools reduce standardized test requirements so that students from more disadvantaged backgrounds are not disadvantaged during the college admissions process. Already more than 1,000 colleges and universities in the United States test optional, and other test flexible (where you don't need to submit test results if you have a certain GPA or meet another requirement). We expect this number to only grow over time. If you have SAT or ACT results, if you still submit them? What if you've already taken the SAT or ACT, or are you able to do so before the college graduation deadline? Should you submit these points? First, we recommend that anyone who has enough ability to take the SAT/ACT. You don't have to fly around the country during a pandemic to take the SAT/ACT, but if you can safely take a test nearby, you should. Your scores may be higher than you expect, and even if you don't, if you apply to an optional testing school, you don't have to submit them. Taking a standardized test gives you most options. Secondly, it is important to understand what the test means optional. When a school says they test optional, it means they don't require SAT or ACT scores, but they will still consider and treat them as part of your application. This does not mean that SAT and ACT scores are no longer important. The only schools that are test blind do not look at standardized test results at all. The blind test is a very rare policy, and currently only Hampshire College follows it. What does this mean for you? This means that, even for an optional school test, strong SAT or ACT scores will absolutely still help your college applications. It's sending test scores won't hurt your application, as these schools have stated, but it also means you're losing a potential chance to make your app stronger. So how do you decide? Use these guidelines: Send test scores if: Your test results are strong (at or near the 75th percentiles admitted students to school) You don't have other strong tests (AP tests, SAT subject tests, etc.) to send the school still recommends presenting scores, if you can't submit test results if: Your test results are low (below 50 percent of admitted students) you are confident in other applications (GPA, grade class, extracurricular classes, etc.) make up the lack of tests You have strong test results with other exams (AP tests, SAT Subject Tests, etc.) that you will represent mainly for people able to take a SAT or ACT, submit their results if you think they will help you. They are still an important part of decision-making, even for test optional schools. Just don't submit ratings if you feel they will be a particularly weak area of your application. College Colleges keep it against you for not being able to take a standardized test, but you still need the rest of your application to be strong to convince them to recognize you. What's next?
