Images (1) The DSC Power 832 has also been one of the most popular DSC security products for years, known as the Model PC5010. It's cheap, full of features, and versatile, which has made a popular choice for DIY alarm systems. It's also the system I chose for my own home. The Power 832 was stopped despite still being available through some outlets. The existing 832 home security systems will also be operational in the coming years. Now if you have one in your home or take over one in the future, this page will help you get to know the system. If you're planning a new installation, keep reading. You'll see why this DSC panel is so popular and why it might be the system you're looking for! The DSC 832 can use several alarm keypads. LED (Light Emitting Diode) keypad models include: PC5508(Z) 8-LED region lightsPC5516(Z) 16-LED region LightsPC5532(Z) 32-LED zone lights LCD (Liquid Crystal Display) keypad model LCD5500(Z) and uses alphanumeric text and numbers to display information. All keypads work almost the same way. The 832 system can support a total of 8 keypads in any combination. The basic DSC 832 panel has 8 internal sites for theft devices and a special fire zone via PGM terminals. Theft zones can be programmed separately for many different responses, so zones can be customized to match many apps. Burglar zones can be added using (3) 5108 zone extender modules, each of which adds 8 zones to the basic system. This gives the PC 5010 maximum capacity of 32 burglary zone wired or wireless. Fire Optimized for 2-wire smoke detectors using the PGM2 terminal. Connections are compatible with several different 2-wire smoke alarm models and provide both switched power and alarm functions in the same two terminals. Using one of the two PGM Outputs ensures that the DSC 832 works with 4-wire smoke detectors. The PGM output provides switched power to reset 4-wire fumes, while one of the standard zone inputs is programmed for the fire alarm function. It can be programmed for many other functions, including two PGM outputs, relay activation, system status outputs, etc. Status outputs, such as system problem and armed status, are automatically issued by the panel. The user can start the relay outputs by pressing the button on the system keypad. In addition, relays can be activated by adding an Escort module remotely (see below). When I installed a DSC Power 832 in my own home, I had my choice of any panel on the market. Alarm business had seen many years later, many panels come and go, while others remained popular. My first requirement was for a programmable system of keypads. This is most of the Radionics line, which requires a separate hand programmer, is out. Secondly, I wanted Alpha screen keypads with customizable text. This alarm is present with various brands, including Ademco home security systems, and I wouldn't have gone wrong choosing one of them. My third largest requirement was the easiest to get, because it was almost standard in the industry: region expandability. The 4-bedroom, 2-bathroom house has four doors and about a dozen moving windows where my wife and I live. I wanted each opening in its region, which DSC 832 can support by adding a single 8-zone expansion module. Finally, recently a client had helped escort 5590TC learn to run the DSC 832 system with module installed. This device connects to the Power 832 alarm and allows you to remotely access your phone over the phone. I liked the idea of being able to club a gadget man and call my house, check the state of the system, arm and disarm, etc. Eventually, adding a zone extender and an Escort module, DSC Power 832 settled. I programmed the system for remote access and connected the panel to check the overhead door of my garage. I don't have to wonder if I forgot to close the garage door. I can call the panel from anywhere, check the condition of the door and press a few buttons to close it. The DSC Power 832 security system has been serving us flawlessly for over 15 years. The only thing I've done is routinely change a battery every few years. If you are planning a new DIY alarm system or a professionally installed system, you can consider DSC Power 1832. It can easily fill the left niche by the discontinued Power 832 and Similar. DSC Power 1832 832 does everything it can, together with 4 episodes (832 only 2 episodes) and other new features. Amazon.com pricing and features of the DSC 1832 security system. Conclusion If you find yourself the new owner of a DSC Power 832 system installed earlier in good condition, consider yourself lucky. If it has the features you want in an alarm system, it will most likely serve you well for years to come. If your system is not at its best, there are some things to consider here: If you do not know the installer code and you have a programming guide, you cannot program the higher functions of the panel, such as zone types, translator, account information, etc. The latest DSC keypads are backward compatible with panels, so you can probably find a replacement for a worn keypad. Depending on age and the state of the Power 832 system, this can be a good option A new system can easily be as little as $99 this day, or even in some cases free, provided you go with monitoring. It spends money on a very old or worn system that is much less cost-effective than the owner of a smartphone or other web-enabled device, consider how useful it will be to use it to disarm weapons and systems remotely. Many new systems are designed to be smartphone compatible from scratch. What happens if you have (or plan) cameras, a new system purchased through a home alarm company that allows many systems to watch live remotely and play smart devices as too will most likely include security equipment like them and most familiar. With flexibility and features, don't be surprised if you recommend a DSC system!
