On average, 51 percent of students in South Carolina are eligible for free or reduced-price lunch, while 90 percent of Mary Ford Elementary students are eligible. At the district level, 49 percent of students are eligible. ProPublica's analysis found that all too often states and schools offer poor students fewer educational programs like Advanced Placement, gifted and talented programs and advanced math and science classes. Studies have linked participation in these programs with better outcomes later in life. Our analysis uses free and reduced-price lunch to estimate poverty at schools. We based our findings on the most comprehensive dataset access to advanced classes and special programs in U.S. public schools — known as the Civil Rights DataSet — released by the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights.Sullivans Island elementary, in Sullivan's Is, S.C., is a lower-poverty school than Mary Ford Elementary, with 4 percent of its students being free or reduced lunch. The school enrolls 23 percent of students in its gifted and talented program. These data points were reported by schools and districts at the Office for Civil Rights.
