Duct tape challenge funny

Paul Hein/Getty Images While some online challenges contribute to good things (like the Ice Bucket Challenge), other social media dares to serve no real purpose. And some of them, like a duct tape challenge, could be quite dangerous. Despite the risks, social media is prompting a challenge. Teens dare each other to give it a try, and many of them share their videos in an attempt to gain a piece of viral fame. And while some parents may think that a challenge with duct tape is harmless fun, some teens get hurt. And it is important that parents understand the risks associated with it so that they can talk to their teens about the dangers. The call with duct tape involves teens wrapping someone in duct tape. They could tie their arms and legs. Or they can glue a teen to a chair -- or even a wall. Then the individual wrapped in the tape tries to escape. Some teens spend hours trying to twist their way out, while others use dangerous stunts to gain freedom. Teens record themselves trying to escape the tape and post the video online. Although the peak of this trend was around 2016 to 2018, many videos are still uploaded and shared on social media sites such as Facebook and YouTube. As the challenge continues to grow, teens continue to try and outdo each other. As a result, problems have become increasingly risky over time. In 2016, 14-year-old Skylar Fish took part in a duct tape challenge. He fell trying to free himself. He hit his head on the window frame and hit the concrete. He crushed his left eye socket and suffered a head injury. He underwent several surgeries over the next year and doctors warned the family he would never be seen again in his left eye. Skylar's family decided to share their story to serve as a warning of the dangers of the challenge. But not everyone listens. In fact, many teens are now posting their misfortunes with a challenge online. If you're looking for an adhesive tape challenge gone wrong you'll find nearly a million videos on YouTube that show teens vomiting, crying, and falling all the way through the challenge. Obviously, the adhesive tape challenge is not the only dangerous activity teens are encouraging each other to do. There are also challenges such as cinnamon challenge, salt and ice challenge and condom challenge -- which can be harmful. As these trends begin to fade, there is no doubt that new challenges will emerge. And there's a good chance your teens will hear about them before you do. You can't keep track of your teenager's activities. But you can give your teen the skills and tools they need to make healthy choices. Talk to your teen about the dangers associated with activities such as a challenge with duct tape. Here are some important talking points: Ask your teen if they know anyone who participates in these challenges. A good way to get started is to say: I just heard about something called a challenge with adhesive tape. Do the kids at your school do that? Ask your teen why they think people are taking part in these types of challenges. Your teens may be able to give you some insight into why teens attend. Whether they say teens are bored or trying to become YouTube stars, listen to their ideas. What do you think of kids who do things like that? Ask for their opinion before you share your thoughts. Let's see if they think the teens who participate are funny, bored, or making bad decisions. Discuss how to recognize danger. Be aware that some challenges can just be fun, but that others could be really harmful. Ask how they would realize if the challenge is potentially dangerous. Talk about how to think about the possible consequences before participating. Talk about strategies to resist peer pressure. Even if your teen knows that something is not a bad idea, they may be tempted to go along with the crowd as well. Identify strategies for resisting peer pressure, even if their friends tease or insist that they participate. Teen brain is not yet fully developed. As a result, teens view the risk differently than adults do. So while your teen may be an equal student, they can make some pretty unreasonable decisions at times. If your teen is involved in ridiculous pranks, or get caught up in dangerous dares, don't ignore the problem. Have serious talk about the potential dangers your teen may be putting you in. Discuss the reasons why they participate as well. Do they need to do something -- like work -- to keep them busy? Is he trying to impress his friends? Consider whether your teen may need help sharpening some of their skills. Maybe they need help to know how to say no. Or maybe they need to find positive activities that increase their self-worth so they don't feel like they need to impress other people. I expect you won't be risky just because your friends do. Simply saying these kinds of words can make your teen think twice about participating in risky behaviors like the adhesive tape challenge. If your teen seems to be a natural risk taker, help them find a healthy outlet. If your teens can't seem to resist dare or love having everything to the next level, limit their privileges. After all, if you're going to drive a car you need to know, your teen can say no when a friend challenges them to drive 100 miles per hour. Thank you for your feedback! What are your concerns?
