The Los Angeles Times listed it among the 100 most influential books published in the last quarterly century, and included it in a survey of books that changed our world, and was called the Book of Genesis for Environmental. For the fifth edition, Nash wrote a new guide and epilogue that brings Wilderness and American Mind into dialogue with contemporary discussions about wilderness. Char Miller's foreword provides a perspective from the 21st century on how the environmental movement has changed, including the ways in which modern scholars re-imagine the dynamic relationship between the natural world and the built environment. Wilderness, unlike mountains, wholes and forests, is a perceived reality, quality. This has more to the geography of the mind than to the land. It's wild to shrink the will... Wilderness literally means a self-walk land. Thoreau, 23: Every day I grow savage and savage, as if I feed on raw meat, and my meekness is just an overgrowth of inviolability. While he acknowledged his love for Concord Thoreau, it was clear how happy he was to discover in the oceans and wilderness that wilderness, unlike mountains, mountains and forests, was a perceived reality, a quality. This has more to the geography of the mind than to the land. It's wild to shrink the will... Wilderness literally means a self-walk land. 23 years old: Every day I grow savage and savage, as if I feed on raw meat, and my meekness is just an overgrowth of inequrie. While acknowledging his love for Concord Thoreau, he made it clear how happy he was when I discovered, in the oceans and wilderness far away, the materials from which a million Concordes could be made – indeed, if I didn't discover them, I lost myself. John Muir: The reassuring desert is a sublime mistress but an impatient wife. The most obvious way into space is through the forest wilderness. In God's wild lies the hope of the world – the great fresh, unit, unsoling wilderness. ... Muir couldn't suppress the laughter of [Thoreau] a man who could see the forests in orchards and huckleberry brush patches, or whose exit in Walden was a common mammal from Concord. Looks like John Muir hated sheep. 1: As the sheep progress, flowers, vegetation, grass, soil, abundance and poetry disappear. It's a bizarrely powerful antipathy for an innocent creature. Thoreau: I want to speak word for nature, for absolute freedom and wilderness... In the wild is the preservation of the world. I went into the woods because I wanted to live on purpose. I believe that Adam in Paradise was not as favorably lying on the whole as the backwoodsman in America... It remains to be seen how Western Adam will turn out in the desert. Twilight in the wild... The scene is stifled by the light of a brilliant sunset, which points to the apocalyptic expectations aroused by the virgin continent. Emerson: America needed some old-world sand to take a tough look at its rich but unent meadows as a prerequisite for cultural greatness. Again, the answer lay in balancing the wilderness and the cultivated. Aldo Leopold: 'The shallow mind of a modern man... following empires, political and economic, there was no humility to perceive... It is only the scholar who appreciates that all history consists of successive trips from a single starting point to which man returns time and time again to organise yet another search for a permanent scale of values. This original wall was a raw wilderness. Bob Marshall: When asked how many wilderness areas America needs, he replied: How many Brahms symphonies do we need? In some respects, natural beauty has taken precedence over synthetic varieties. In the presence of the wilderness, Marshall noticed that all the senses were playing in the game. Teddy Roosevelt urged his countrymen to lead a hard life. This included contact with the wilderness: pioneering was an important antidote to dull medievalism. Our civilization is getting more complicated, we need a greater, not less, development of fundamental border virtues. William Bartram, born into a family that cherished the life of the mind... has started extensive research in pointless regions in the southeast... He traveled 3,000 miles and had a detailed diary, acknowledged that he is seduced by these magnificent charming scenes of primitive nature, and in the Karolinska wilderness there is astonishment and astonishment, a sublimely terrible scene of power and magnificence, a world of mountains accumulated on the mountains. As with European aesthes, the sublime was associated with God's magnificence in nature, and Bartram often praised the supreme author of nature, whose wisdom and power manifested itself in the wild. The philosopher of the forest, who contrasts the wild genius of the forest with tawdry art productions. Estwick Evans: how great the benefits of solisy are!— How sublime is the silence of the ever-active energies of nature! In the name of the desert, there is something that fascinates the ear and moves the spirit of man. That's the faith. Jeremy Belknap: Poetic fancy can find full luxury among these wild and unusual scenes... old mountains, big rises, rolling clouds, incoming rocks, verdante forest... and roar torrent... twist, comfort, wrap. James Hall: I don't know anything more wonderful than the forest of the west, which stands in its original integrity, which is a hesicho by exciting beautiful plants and crowned with a venerable age... the forest is visible in His Majesty; The pomp and pride of the wilderness are here. Here nature is pristine and the silence is unsotten. By thinking of wild nature as an active-branded brand on the international market, the valuation is explained and largely explains the global movement of nature protection. The relationship between exports and imports underlines the irony inherent in the fact that the civilisational process, which undermines wildlife nature, is precisely the one that creates the need for it. As a rule, nations that have wilderness don't want it, and those who want it don't have it... A branded store is an experience. Importers ingest it on the premises. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, American nationalists began to understand that in the wild their nature was their country without a bow. While other nations might have had the occasional wild peak or patch of heath, it was not the equivalent of a wild continent. And if, as many suspect, the wilderness was the medium through which God spoke most clearly, then America had a clear moral advantage in Europe, where centuries of civilisation had devised a layer of art over its works. Is there a country in the world that is better calculated than ours for practicing and exhaling imagination – to call into the activity of the creative power of the mind, and afford only the views of the beautiful, beautiful, and sublime America had mountains, lakes, rivers, waterfalls, and boundless forests of inequality throughout the world. [De Witt Clinton concluded that] We calculate the wild, romantic and terrible landscape by creating a correspondent impression in the imagination – to raise all the feelings of the heart. Similar statements were made by legions. Whoever wanted to agree that man would not necessarily be a great poet because he lived near a great mountain, he was shouted as a non-erator to his country. Dwight even felt it was worth comparing to a culturally magnificent Europe. Converting the desert into a desirable abode for man, he declared at the beginning of the century, can at least compenss the desire of ancient castles, destroyed abbeys and beautiful paintings. For a young country, confident about its achievements and eager to justify independence through success, the addition of the wilderness has cemented the national ego. We're such human! What kind of country is ours, in 1845, josiah grinnell was surrounded, but it was like a desert yesterday. Nathaniel P Willis: Our forests, as fresh as they were, from the hands of the Creator, are, out of dispute, useless. Washington Irving: The charms of nature [including] its valleys that smell from wild fertility... Her boundless plains... Her forests without a trace... No, I never need an American view beyond my country for a sublime and beautiful natural landscape. The wild world, according to David Brower, fills man's need for an environment where it can be reminded that civilization is just a thin veneer above the deep evolutionary flow of the things they built. North of 60 degrees latitude, the sun doesn't even shine in the center of winter. ... More... More
