Bmw 507 for sale

It was a close call, but we expect a bigger margin in 2020. It's not every day that a Toyota and BMW comparison is a legitimate one, but that's the case with the Toyota Supra and the BMW Z4. Unless you've been hiding under a rock, you'll know now that the two cars share a platform and a sublime six-cylinder engine (in the case of the Z4 M40i), although in several states of tune. So, although these two look very different, their shared components beg the question: which one has achieved more on the sales charts? In total 2019, the Z4 will take it with a slim 57 pieces, with 2,941 roadsters going to the 2,884 of the GR Supra coupé. It's not as simple as that, though. Toyota BMW Although the Z4 moved more total units last year, the first sales month was in March 2019, while the First Month of the Supra was July 2019. Despite the bmw's lead, the Supra has almost caught up and if we assess the sales figures from July to December 2019, the Toyota sold the BMW with a healthy 1,256 units locally. In Europe, the trend is reversed. From July to November 2019, the Z4 de Supra was expanded by 3,002 units (3,845 to 843). At the moment, however, the Supra seems to have the edge in North America, and perhaps it's no big surprise, since toyota's starting price of $49,990 gives you that brilliant inline six, while you have to spend $63,700 on the Z4 sDrive M40i. Chrysler's most stylistic concepts Our favorite Automotive Easter Eggs BMW Toyota Toyota You could also make the argument that the Supra badge is more revered than the Z4's. Toyota, long associated with reliable but unobtrusive family sedans, gets attention when it makes something like the dramatic Supra (which takes its roots back to the legendary 2000GT), while the Z4 is just a fast, luxury drop-top of a brand that has made loads of them over the past few decades. Despite the power of the Supra (it's 335 hp compared to the 382 hp of the Z4 M40i), it's lighter and comes in just over four seconds at 60 mph, just two tenths of a second after the Z4. Closely aligned they may be in a straight line, but for now, the Supra seems to be finding favor with more Americans than its German twins, and with a new entry-level version with a 2.0-liter turbo-four, the Toyota is likely to widen the gap even further. Toyota BMW Toyota And they can not be bought separately. The BMW M3 coupe and convertible are no longer, replaced by the M4. If BMW had not continued to change the number, then today we would just be the next gen M3 coupe and convertible. But no, BMW chose to split the two- and four-door variants into two models. Many M-brand enthusiasts are not at all happy with the move, but what has been done is done. So maybe as a way to end the convertible to commemorate, someone is now selling a few of them on eBay: a 1991 E30 M3 and a 2013 E92 E92 Both convertibles. Both special. Why? One represents the first generation and the other represents the last. The E30 is a fully documented, two owner car with less than 75,000 miles on the clock. Only 786 E30 M3 convertibles were made. Power, of course, comes from a 2.5-liter inline-four with about 240 horsepower, and coupled with a five-speed manual. The E92 comes with that beautiful naturally aspirated 4.0-liter V8 with 414 horsepower. It is paired with the well-known dual-clutch gearbox. It has less than 10,000 miles and there is still time left on the BMW warranty. But if you want one, you have to buy both. The seller has made it clear that this is a package deal and that the cars are not sold separately. The current asking price is $110,000 for the couple. Or will the i3 still fail against the Tesla Model S? The BMW i3 is a pretty cool car, it has to be said; it looks funky and futuristic and according to some journalists, is the ultimate floating machine. However, the range was a little lacking compared to that of the overly acclaimed Tesla Model S with only 72 miles on electricity alone and 81 miles with the optional but heavy two-cylinder gas engine range extender. However, it seems that BMW has a solution; the German car manufacturer gives the i3 a new battery. The 22kWh battery remains, but has a higher power density, increasing the range. The result? Expect the i3 with the new battery to have a range of up to 124 miles on a full charge; still not enough compared to the range of the Model S of more than 200 miles per full change. The i3 also gets an improved electronics package on the software for the battery cooling system and the electric motor. The new battery can also be mounted on the i3s with the extended battery option, and on pre-existing i3s. Image: BMW BMW is an acronym for Bayerische Motoren Werke, which roughly translates to the Bavarian Engine Works Company. In this name lies a hint to what the company first manufactured: engines. The company produced aircraft engines, but after the Treaty of Versailles the German manufacturer was forbidden to make them. BMW turned and began the production of railway brakes and built-in engines. In 1923 BMW had produced its first motorcycle, the R 32. Only 10 years later, BMW would launch its first completely new, self-developed car: the 303. After the 303, BMW would go from strength to strength in the automotive world, finding particular success in the executive saloon niche. The 3 Series, BMW's best-selling model, has been listed on auto and driver magazine annual Ten Best for 22 consecutive years: this makes it the longest-running entry on the list. As a result, BMW has built up what is only are described as a cult-like following. It is not only the car market that BMW has a dominant presence, it is also the go-to manufacturer in the adventure and sportbike motorcycle niches. From long wheelbase cars made for the instead of the driver going to motorcycles that you like all over the world, there are BMWs for all races and creeds. The concept car is powered by the well-known 3.0-liter inline-six (which will also power the X3) which delivers 225 hp. It has a manual transmission (which will be an option on the X3) and of course a four-wheel drive based on the X5 sport ute's. The LAPD's fleet of i3s is for sale, reports Bimmer Life. To help combat Los Angeles' notoriously poor air quality, Mayor Eric Garcetti proposed moving all of the city's fleets to electric or plug-in hybrid vehicles in 2014. The then new non-emergency administrative fleet of the Los Angeles Police Department was part of this push and in 2015 accepted bids from BMW, Tesla and other electrified vehicle makers to supply them with cars. BMW Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti and Chief of Police Charlie Beck introduce the new BMW i3 police fleet. An unlikely contender won over longer-range fare like the Tesla Model S: the cute carbon-fiber-bodied, all-electric BMW i3. According to Bimmer Life, from 2016, the department would lease 100 BMW i3s per year for three years, but according to The Current Review's Andrew Lambrecht, the least was postponed in 2018 without explanation. While many of the LAPD's Capparis White i3s remained relatively unobtrusive, some cars were dressed in LA's black and white police car livery, complete with a light bar on top. The intentions were good, but the price tag was high. Taxpayers paid $10,267,699 to lease the BMWs and install the charging infrastructure to assist them, per Bimmer Life. Worse, most of them hardly any use. While the i3 non-emergency fleet was intended for community outreach initiatives and other business tasks—not the police chases LA is notorious for -they were very unpopular with the people who were supposed to use them. LA is a huge city, and the first run of LAPD i3s had only the 22-kWh battery that produced 81 miles of range, reports Bimmer Life. These weren't the models with the gas-powered range extender, either, and the staff worried about getting stuck somewhere on the road. The 2017 fleet that replaced that first 2016 lease run got only a small bump in battery size, making 114 miles of travel on one charge. That wasn't enough to alleviate the range anxiety within the department. That's a very real fear, because it certainly wouldn't be the first time an electric police vehicle ran out of juice during the service. It can be difficult to tell fleet users who are used to parking and burning cars to remember that they are connecting an EV, leading to cars that were left unladen when others start using them. A 2018 CBS Los Angeles survey found that most i3s had three or four digits on the counter. The cars with more kilometers were sometimes used for non-professional purposes. CBS even confronted an LAPD commander at a nail salon when they saw her one of the cars to get a manicure. Many of the ex-LAPD i3's are for sale through the dealer who rented them primarily to the department: New Century BMW. Although there is not much listed online now (presumably because the the cars were a big part), Bimmer Life reports that the dealer listed the cars as ex-government vehicles with certified pre-owned status. The cars sport the DeKa World dark cloth interiors and 19-inch alloy wheels. Most are priced well below $20,000, with some even going down in the $15,000 range. So, what didn't work for the LAPD's fleet could work very well for you if you're looking for a relative bargain on a BMW EV. Do you have a tip or comment? Send us a message: tips@thedrive.comCorrection: Wednesday, September 2, 2020, 9:13 a.m. ET: An earlier version of this story misstated that Los Angeles rented 100 i3's a year starting in 2016. However, the lease was postponed without explanation in 2018, according to The Current Review's Andrew Lambrecht, which follows the BMW i3's saga and its sale. This has been corrected above.
