Link to this page: Good things to come to those waiting for good things Good things come to those who wait is an advertising slogan used by Diageo in TV, film and print advertising campaigns promoting guinness brand draft stouts in the UK. The slogan formed the cornerstone of advertising agency Abbott Mid Vickers BBDO's successful pitch to secure a Guinness account in 1996. Their suggestion was to turn negative consumer opinions of the time needed to pour a glass of Guinness correctly on the tab. Similar ideas such as snapper me have been incorporated into several Guinness campaigns in the past, such as Irish Guinness Time Television. Sights from the early 1990s. Good stuff... The first piece of 60 seconds of swimming TV and movie ads, in which an aging local sports hero swims from an annual offshore buoy to his brother's seaside pub, pouring exactly the watch of a pint of Guinness into the bar. The ad, which premiered on May 16, 1998, succeeded in increasing sales, particularly with its older male demographic. Another major success of the campaign was the critically received surfer ad, which was released in 1999. A more serious black-and-white work for television and film inspired by Walter Crane's 1892 painting The Horse of Neptune. Surfer was voted the best ad of all time in a 2002 poll conducted by the Sunday Times and Channel 4. After several other variations on the subject, including black and Dreamer's bets, the campaign was put on the backrough. The main motivation for this was the decision to abandon local advertising in the UK and Ireland in the same way as the Guinness campaign in the North American and African Michael Power series. Good thing... The slogan was difficult to translate, so I decided to pursue other campaign ideas. Two of the more successful slogans attempted between 2000 and 2005 were The Story of Believe and Light and Darkness. — Abe Lincoln, the act of the Apostle C.W.
