Because the account system used on the Xbox One console is the same as the one used for the Microsoft Store on a Windows 10 computer, money added to an Xbox account through an Xbox One redeem code will also be usable on Windows 10 devices using the same account. For example, if you redeem an Xbox One gift card code for $50 on an Xbox One console, you can use $30 to buy Xbox One games, then use the remaining $20 to buy apps or movies on your Windows 10 computer. Microsoft and Xbox accounts are the same. They simply use different names depending on the device you're using. Since Windows and Xbox both use Microsoft accounts, you can actually redeem Xbox One gift card codes on Windows Windows and redeem a Microsoft gift card on your Xbox One. Xbox Live redeem codes are similar to Xbox and Microsoft gift card codes, but instead of adding credit to a Microsoft account that can be spent on digital purchases, this feature activates an Xbox Live Gold subscription or extends the duration of the current plan. You can redeem your Xbox Live gift card code in exactly the same way as your Xbox and Microsoft codes. One of the easiest ways to redeem an Xbox code is through the Microsoft website. If it's that thought count, then gift cards don't count much at all. They're popular, granted. Six out of 10 respondents to the National Retail Federation survey this year said they wanted to receive gift cards for holidays, and more than half said they planned to give them. The rest of us can think of gift cards as a cop-out. Gift cards are what you offer when you don't have a clue what for the recipient to bookmark and can not get in trouble for himself to learn. Okay, that's not entirely fair. The gift card seems to be the only card solution when you are dealing with, say, the constantly changing whims of your teenage niece and nephew. But why bother with plastic? Just give them cash (or prepaid debit cards). Cash is spent. A large piece of what sinks on gift cards - about $10 billion per year, according to market research firm CEB - has yet to be spent. These gifts are not considered a greater waste of money, of course. Everyone has stories of failed etiotics: The etical book (extra point if it's from your mother-in-law). Boxes of chocolates for a person with allergies, on a diet or both. Get back the gift you gave to the forgotten person the previous year. Good gifts can be all over the map as well, but they share a similar characteristic. They used to say, I know you. Giving good gifts can be extremely difficult. It takes time, energy and some sleuthing. You have to stop thinking about yourself - what you want, what you think recipients should have or be or do - and think deeply about others: How do they want to spend their time? What are they passionate about? What will make their lives easier or more enjoyable? It is an exercise in sympathy that takes us away from ourselves and brings us closer to those we love. Gifts that say 'I get you' The last gifts are unexpected people. They are something the recipient will not think of or buy yourself. They can be surprised and delighted. This is why gift guides that magazines and websites want to feature in the end are disappointing. There is not a size that fits all the good gifts. The shiny chef's knife would be nirvana for a budding chef that would be a terrible gift to someone who stores books in the oven. On the other side, who would think that an old, battered lunchbox would be a good gift? However, a friend of mys considers it one of her best. Her husband searched for savings shops, vintage shops and auction sites for months to find lunch that she loved, and lost, in childhood. Money only complicates matters. Do we have a budget or are we stupid? For savers, getting a lot of a great gift is the holy grail. Too often, though, the bargains are not awesome, and awesome is no bargain. I'm not good at giving gifts, but I'm trying to get better. I'm learning to splurge more often, because I want to delight people I love more than fritter money away on other things that bring less joy. I also pay attention to those around me who are for good. Here's what they have in common: They listen and take notes. Some of the best gift giveaways keep a list of ideas running in laptops or on their smartphones. They participate in Comments. Friends and loved ones can be a great source of ideas, plus they can tell you what recipients already have. They're not waiting for Black Friday. It is more likely that you will stumble across another great gift 11 months of the year. They're not just for stuff. Tools. bring happier properties, research suggests. Sometimes they fail. Choosing a gift means taking risks, and no one gets it right all the time. At the beginning of our marriage, my husband, who was normally a great gift giveer, gave me a waffle iron. I didn't even completely unwrapped the present before I blurted out, We'll nip this in the bud. (A note for spouses everywhere: Do not give anything with a plug unless it is specifically requested. Even then, think twice.) Speaking of specific requirements, those of us who are not great gift giveees still have a great option: wish list. We didn't get the thrill of out-of-the-hit parks, but at least we listened. What if someone else really wants a gift card? By all ways, give them. But we should not give up trying to find real gifts for those we love. We're better for our efforts.
