Plural of hero

Recently, I had the honor of sitting with five licensed practical nurses (LPNs) from the VA Sierra Nevada Health System at a quiet private airport in Reno, Nevada. We waited for their plane, courtesy of the U.S. Air Force, to arrive and whisk these heroes to New Jersey. They were on their way to provide relief to tired practitioners fighting a pandemic. These LPNs voluntarily go to New Jersey to help medical professionals in nursing homes, where employees are stretched to breaking point caring for their high-risk older population. As I sat with them, I realized that I had honest admiration not only for these five people, but also for my entire VA health team. The sisters are on their way to New Jersey to help. None of them expressed regret at their decision to volunteer. Each would work nonstop, 12-hour shifts (perhaps longer) with complete strangers, caring for elderly citizens on the east coast. They spoke with compassion and used phrases like: This is what I was born to do. We need nurses now more than ever One even claimed that he doesn't have a family here in Nevada and if asked to extend his short tour to New Jersey, he'd gladly be. He said he hoped he would inspire someone to consider a career in health care. We need more nurses, she said, now more than ever. A small Air Force C-21 plane arrived and three young crew members stepped on the runway. Through the lounge window, six of us made comments about the crew's appearance in their military-issued olive green flight suits. We started making top gun references. It looks like Maverick, said one. If there's Goose, we're fucked! said another. We all burst into laughter, which grew even more when three young service members entered the airport expecting to be overwhelmed by our good humor. Their faces quickly turned into comforting smiles. They realized this moment was necessary. God's speed and safe travels The pilot assured everyone that if the plane was refuelled, loaded and pre-flight checks done, they would be on their way. The flight crew kindly made fun of me with pictures of them with our sisters and the plane. I helped load lon bags on a plane and made a safe trip for everyone. We stayed at the small airport to look through the window until the wheels were off the ground. God speed and safe travels, I said out loud. I heard Amen behind me and turned to see the baggage handler had come to see as well. To a nurse who claimed she doesn't have a family here in Nevada, I'm asking for a disagreement. You have a VA. Together we are strong and together we are family. Shane Whitecloud is a Navy veteran and public relations officer with the VA Sierra Nevada health system. We want - and we need - men who work with us as partners to define how the workplace should work for everyone's benefit. Related: How to address gender inequality at work The main job is pushing against the status quo and the question of whether existing ways of working, practices and cultures really reflect today's values and drive inclusion for both men and women. This is not about separating men from women; forming an internal women's group is not a solution. It's about finding better ways to work together. Nor does it have to be about looking at the rearview mirror and revisiting past generations of ways to do things. It is about looking to the future and how it operates. There are huge benefits to gain, the benefits we all reap: Related: Shifting the Paradigm to Embrace Gender Differences There are small things you can do right now to start changing the tide. Mentor up-and-coming female co-worker. Introduce the women with whom you work to key men in your networks and vice versa. Make sure that you distribute or rotate administrative/household tasks firmly between male and female team members at work. Ensure that women have the time to present meaningfully important meetings. Go bat for professional development specific to women. Changing the status quo may seem like a monumental task. But like any great effort, it can be divided into small tasks that you can start shredding away right away. Momentum starts to build, and then it starts to carry on and generates its energy and excitement. Every next step becomes easier. For men who have been great partners and mentors and helped, let's say thank you. Please continue to help, keep the dialogue and example for others. You're going to make it possible for us all to win. (Michelle Bogan. Bogan is the founder and CEO of Equity for Women.) Mary Smyth/Moment/Getty Images Plural in the form of Christmas at Christmases. The plural of the correct noun, which is the name of a particular person, place, or thing, often forms the same as the plural of a more general or common noun. In general, the most correct noun is made in the plural, adding the letter s. That's why all members of the Smith family are called Smiths. However, if the name ends z or s as Christmas, you must add the letters es. When the correct noun ends with the letter y, the end is placed s. Weekdays, such as Sundays or Fridays, are good examples of this rule.
