Um found myth Jean Stothert zu webinden, triple Facebook no heute bei. Omaha has a new department of complaints of the right kind of finger you. Omaha Mayor Jean's stothert was revealed Wednesday. The site gives people a new way to report problems in their neighborhoods and an online system Stothert said will expand services already offered by the mayor's direct line. Last year, that hotline channel more than 38,000 service requests to the city department – neighborhood complaints about things like litter, dilapidated houses, and the ex-igniter: pools. But all these complaints were taken over the phone. Now downtown is bringing the Internet into the fight. Majisl Stothert said: 'We just want as many resources' easy-to-use, easy-to-navigate, that we maybe can win. And the important thing for this one is to provide updates and feedback to those who filed the complaint. Felicia Russell, who operates a beauty and salon barber in the Benson area, said she hopes the new system works because she hasn't had much success with the others. My building actually had graffiti on it like maybe three times already, he said. I called and reached out, and I never received any feedback. And they said they would come back to me. That never happened. The mayor said the website will be more efficient and more customer friendly. It provides continuous feedback to people who, with updates on the people who have done the reports to us. The Mayor's Hotline staff also takes reports across as well as those called at 402-444-5555 or email. Felicia says she will wait and see if the new website helps. It will only help if it's effective. If it isn't effective, what's in use in there are two lines? The site costs $35,000 to developers – paying out of the city's general fund. You can also use it to report anxiety in Douglas County, Count.
