Note from the editor: Hans-Werner Lienau is a published author, character collector, high-value railroader model and diorama builder in Hamburg, Germany. Me, when Hans-Verner, when I helped him track down a set of big Lionel numbers for his collection. When Hans-Werner's hobby of collecting characters from Elastolin and similar brands collided with the purchase of the LGB train, he decided to start using some of his pieces in the environment with his trains on a large scale. When I saw the desert photo in the title, I asked him for more information and sent the photos on this page and a brief explanation. I tried to fill in the gaps where I thought it was necessary. This particular project is best suited for use with large-scale trains (such as LGB and AristoCraft), but the principle of reminging toys for use for models applies to any scale. Before I teach my project, I'd like to fill in the background on me and my combination of model railroading and wild Western characters. Plastic figures and toy trains – Since my first school days, I've had a HO model railway and some books by German Wild West author Karl May. His characters, including Indian Winnetou and his friend Old Shatterhand, were heroes of my childhood. Every day going home after school I had to walk past a small shop that sold heinerle-wundert one (surprise bag, literally Bag of Wonder). While you never knew exactly what you were going to get, it always included sweets and one 60mm figure. The themes of the numbers varied from the Wild West to farmland or Africa. They were made by domplast, Manurba or Jean. Since then, I have been collecting plastic figures (although these days I mostly collect elastolin data from the German company Hausser). In those years, my favorite summer activity was playing with my characters outside. My favorite winter activity was model railroading in the basement. As I got a little older and started spending time with other activities, my numbers gradually disappeared. But the figures of the wild west remained in a forgotten bag deep in my mother's basement. LGB revives interest in both hobbies - A few years later, when my little daughter and I saw the layout of LGB, both hobbies woke up again at the same time. We were hoping to build an outdoor railway using LGB trains, Pola buildings and elastolin and Preiser figures. But there is always a difference between theory and reality – we were only able to create a temporary layout, and most of it was built inside. Planning Dioramas - All the time I also planned to build dioramas to display pieces from my collection of characters - most of them should not stay on the garden railway for long anyway. But under my current circumstances, the only time trains run is for Christmas, so I focused on building diorams. In the meantime, my From the wild west the numbers have grown to about 1000, and I sometimes repaint cheap characters or build my own from scratch. The first conversion of My Desert Diorama began to become a reality after visiting Flohmarkt (Flea Market), where I picked up some cheap plastic cacti that were made in China. One of them was a bizarre green, so I decided to give them all a new color job. Before and after photos are below: [Note from the editor: The detail of the photo on the right shows the kind of detail the work Hans-Werner does in his image. Although this step did not explain, it looks like it mixed fine sand with paint for the base, then, when it was dry, wiped with a slightly paler color to bring out the structure of the sand. The needles on the cactus also appear to be fine white sand, probably wiped off while the paint was still wet.] Off-brand prickly pear gets the same treatment. Playmobil's Cactus Get the Same Treatment I liked the new look so much that I also started painting my Playmobil cactus (from file 7068). I also started planning desert diorama to use for photographing my characters. Finally, Playmobil's saguaro gets a makeover. Other Playmobil Accessories It went so well that I started borrowing pieces from other Playmobil sets. The base of this dead tree from set 3748 gets the same treatment as the other bases. The tree is painted gray, then wiped with a different color with a brush that is almost dry. This dead tree set is from set 4205. the base gets plugged in before the paint continues. This designation is from set 3748. Using a dry brush or similar approach will allow you to weather the sign without smoothing the font. Playmobile Fauna Of course, no American desert is complete without wildlife, alive or dead. So I pulled out my Playmobil vultures and painted them carefully. Attention to detail, such as painting their talons with contrasting color. A set of bleached cow bones and a pair of plastic sidewinders also passed through a detailed and dry brush. Here, modernized animals and other accessories are placed together on a sand base that uses the same color as cactus stands. In the photo on the right, I placed one of my large locomotives to give a sense of the size of these things. Conclusion Remember that this whole project began with a trip to the flea market. Pay attention to toys or other things that you can use to add interest in the model railway, exhibition village, diorama or other display. Also, if you have a similar project that you would like to share with your fellow readers and hobbyists, we would like to add it to our site, and we will be sure to give you full credit for your post. Whether you're building a desert diorama because you want an Egyptian theme with pyramids and other things, or you're building a diorama because Make battle scenes from WW I or WW II these techniques will work well for you. The desert is still the same for both of us! If you want a full tutorial from start to finish on how to do diorama with this kind of theme, you should check out my Egyptian diorama. But if you are familiar with diorama making techniques I have desert details here. White sand For the most realistic look, you can use real sand. It is available online at amazon.com and at almost every arts and crafts store. How to attach sand to diorama You will put even a coat of sand on the whole diorama, but it will not be perfect. First, you should paint the surface with the color of sand. This will cover up any irregularities in the sand. Use a color that is about the same color as the sand you use but is not very critical. After the paint has dried, mix the white glue with the same part of the water. This is in the metal cup I'm using. Then it's just a diorama brush. Once you have even a coat then just sprinkle sand on it. Put on a nice even coat. Adding details An excellent desert detail are small tufts of yellowish grass. You can buy this grass from forest paintings, or you can improvise something like cutting bristles from a brush. You put them together as in the picture, and then glue the bundle directly into a piece of glue.
