In my case, it ended up being the fried chip of the North Bridge. In order to make room, I had to remove the epoxy coler from the northern bridge chip. As soon as I had that out of the way, I started to see what my highest point was. In my case, the capacitors that were next to the processors were the highest point and I had to remove some to get the clock to fit flush with the motherboard. Once the space was created, I began to assemble the clock face and movements. I decided to use a lightscribe CD and burn the clock face to CD. For those of you who are not familiar with lightscribe, this technology allows you to burn an image on the label side of a CD using a special CD Burner Drive. Your drive must support lightscribe to make this part instructable. If you don't have a lightscribe disc, its just as easy to make a cool print face for a CD. I used Roxio Creator to design a simple clock face. Using Roxio Creator to design a clock face on a lightscribe disc is beyond the scope of this instructable. Once you have created and printed the clock face of your time for assembly. In the attached photo you can see from left to right the order of mounting the cheek clock. Make sure the pieces are comfortable and safe. Once the clock movement is assembled, simply set the time and add one side of the velcro tape stick to the back of the movement, making sure it won't prevent the clock from setting the dial. Ad the other side of the Velcro mounting point on the motherboard and attach to the movement clock and motherboard together. Use one of the mounting holes on the corner of the motherboard to hang the clock on the wall. Sometimes depending on the weight and balance of the board, you may need to add a second nail to the bottom of the clock to ensure it is level. And that's it. Your job! Sick hours all right? I had these hours mounted at work and get a lot of comments about it! If you have any questions, comments, suggestions, or criticisms: Please feel free to report to me or Comment! So next time... Keep calm and geek on! So you have some plastic stoppers inserted into the wall and you can't get out. Here's a really easy way to remove them with ease. Not much really. A round clock face is a traditional choice, and a face with a white or cream background provides the best contrast with the digits, making it easier to read from a distance or at an angle. A simple, classic frame around your face helps the watch in any room, anytime. La Crosse Atomic Wall Clock is praised for its bright, simple style and elegant digits. Design along the edges will help you count down to a minute. Like the atomic clock, it is automatically set via radio signal to the nearest atomic clock for maximum accuracy. It even automatically adjusts to daylight saving time — so there's no work to do because you happen to be asleep! A good wall clock doesn't have to be expensive and can be as good at keeping you on time as a fancy clock. Cheap clocks can be made of the cheapest materials, with plastic or cardboard face and framing done in metal or plastic, and it may not have automatic adjustment, which more expensive clock would be. The style is classic and non-attacking and the numbers are bright and good looking, with dots along the edges telling a more accurate time. At 10-inches in diameter, it's slightly smaller than some other options, but it can be an advantage for smaller spaces. Calendar reminders and phone notifications are fine, but sometimes a good, old-fashioned wall clock is the best way to keep meetings on track and count down the minutes until lunchtime! Wall clocks for your office should have a clean, business-like feel. You don't want it to be too big, but you want it to be big enough to look at it quickly from across the room. High-contrast white backgrounds and black letters also make it easier to read. Plus, maybe you don't want anything too zany to compete with your professional persona. This nice wall clock from Latitude Run has a design-forward font and a sleek metal frame for a look that is hip and professional, too. The kitchen is a room where many homeowners like to have a little more fun and choose playful, friendly decorations. So it goes with a wall clock where you could go with the clock in an unusual color, or with decorative motifs or in an unexpected shape that can show off your personality. This retro diner-inspired wall clock certainly makes sense for Digits are made in quirky font, and the orange metal frame brightens all the kitchen. For dining room, check out the clock that fits into your interior and has a more formal feel than the clock in other rooms of the house. Often it means finding a clock with a pendulum, or one with a frame made of wood with carved details that will go well with furniture or moldings in your dining room. You may also prefer the hours that blend in with the décor so that your dinner guests won't feel like they're on the clock, but it allows you to mind the minutes if you're waiting for the meal to finish in the oven. These clocks have a solid oak case, gold-tone pendulum and Roman numerals to complete the elegant effect. In the living room, you don't want your clock to just tell the time – it should be part of the décor as well! So in this room, it's good to go BIG with the clock and get a statement piece on a large scale that will take the place of artwork over a ledge or sofa. A clock with an open face that shows that the wall behind makes a bold statement without seeming too bulky. Other notable features of this super-striking clock are its Roman numerals, which appear more like structural elements than time-keeping numbers. This super-popular clock has over 1,200 positive reviews on Wayfair and is praised for fitting perfectly into different spaces. When preparing in the morning, wall clocks can be an essential tool for working on time! The clock, which looks nice in your bathroom and can be read at a glance, will help you move on without having to check your phone while showering or shaving. Here, check out the clock to complement your accessories, wardrobe hardware and other decorative details in the room. If you have metal accents all the time, these clocks in stainless steel, black or copper finishes might just be appropriate. The clock is medium sized, with bright red hands, making it easy to tell the time. While you may be accustomed to having hours in your home, more traditional clock styles can look out of place in a modern apartment, apartment or loft-style space. So look at the clock with minimal, unexpected details like one-tone faces and long, thin hands to tell the time. While this white-to-white clock may be harder to read than traditional clocks, it will complement modern décor without looking nervous or out of place.
