Author: Charlie Higgins Written on: July 14, 2020 Iomega produces a number of external hard drives that can be used to back up file usage. Backup is the process of saving files in second place in case something happens to the original files on your computer. Iomega's external hard drives are fast, portable and work with both Mac and Windows Platforms. Regular backup files and reduce the risk of losing valuable work. Iomega produces a number of external hard drives that can be used to back back your files. Backup is the process of saving files in second place in case something happens to the original files on your computer. Explore the USB cable (supplied with drive) and pay attention to its ends. One end is a full-size USB connector and the other is a mini USB connector. Connect the mini-USB to the mini-USB port on the hard drive. Connect the other end to a USB port on your computer. Look at the state light on the hard drive. Plug in an extra USB connector if the light is dim or flashing. The second USB connector has a small zipper on it stating that it provides extra power on the hard drive. Make sure the disk icon appears on your desktop. It can also appear in my computer, or in Finder for Mac. Double-click the hard drive icon to open it. Drag and lower the files you want to return to the hard drive window. You can drag and drop multiple files and folders at the same time; Hold the control key (or Apple key) to select multiple items. Look at the state light on the hard drive. Drag and lower the files you want to return to the hard drive window. Throw out the hard drive as soon as you finish backing up. Click the right drive icon and select Eject. Turn off the drive from your computer. Backup data is important, and while storing information in the cloud has become second nature to most, there's still nothing better than having everything stored on a physical device. External drives are simple: you plug them in, they appear on your computer and you can drag the files straight over. But your drive doesn't appear when you plug it in, you may have problems. Here are a few steps you can take to fix the problem. Advertising I know, I know, but listen to me: just because you hooked the drive in a computer doesn't necessarily get the energy it needs. While some drives may extract enough energy from your computer's USB port, others, especially large drives not designed for portable ones, may need wall power to rotate. If your drive came with a AC power adapter but you haven't plugged it in, try plugging it in (and pressing the power button if it is). If it comes with two USB connectors, make sure they're both connected to your computer. If you're lucky, your drive will appear normally as soon as it gets the juice it needs. If the drive is still down, turn it off and try another USB port. It is possible the port in question fails, or just be fussy with your particular drive. If it's connected to a USB 3.0 port, try USB 2.0. If it's connected to a USB hub, try plugging it directly into your computer instead. You can also try it in another computer. If you are a multiplatform household, I would especially recommend trying it into a PC that runs another operating system-for example, if you can't get a drive showing up on a Windows PC, try plugging it into a Mac. You may not be formatted for the computer you're trying to use, and you need to copy that data to a cross-compatibility drive. If your drive is on but still doesn't appear in File Explorer, it's time to do some digging. Open the Start menu and enter drive control and press Enter when using the Creation option and hard drive format. As soon as the disk control is loaded, scroll down to see if your drive appears on the list. If so, make sure it's online and formatted. If it's offline, click the right button on the disk name (like Disk 2) and select Online.If the drive hasn't been formatted (it'll speak Unallocated under the black bar), click the right button and select the new simple volume. This will also solve the problem if the drive is formatted for another operating system as described above. Keep in mind that formatting will erase any data on the drive, so only continue if you're sure you don't need anything from it. Finally, if your drive is online and formatted but doesn't show the disk's letter next to its name, tap the right volume button and select Change Drive Letter and Paths to add the letter of the disk. If you're lucky, one of these simple steps is to get a new drive up and running. In some more specific cases, the drive will appear in the Disk Management, but simply formatting the drive won't work. This is very common with SD cards formatted with Linux distributions for Raspberry Pi, for example. to restore the full capacity of the disk, you need to run a clean Command Windows, which will return the drive to a completely non-format state. Again, this will erase anything on it, so just continue if you don't have other options and make sure you're cleaning the correct drive, or you can lose a lot of data. Open start start Enter the dispart and click Enter. When the hint appears, enter the drive list and click Enter to see the drives connected to your system. If you see that the disk in question appears - pay close attention to its size - pay attention to its name (say, Disc 2) and run the select disc 2 command using the disk you want to clean. Finally, enter the net and click Enter. This will erase the disk, after which you can follow the above steps to format it from the Disk Control console. If none of the above options work, you should remove the disk from the outer case and check the drive yourself. The components that convert this SATA drive into USB can fail, which means that the drive can be just fine if you plug it in some other way. If you have a desktop computer, you can open it and connect the drive directly to the motherboard. If not, you can buy a new external SATA-to-USB adapter dock or case, plug in that naked drive and then plug that into your computer via USB. If it works, then your old enclosure (or its power supply) may be dead. If your drive is still not recognized, you may have a dead disk. Contact the manufacturer to see if you are still under warranty, and make sure your other hard drives are in good working order.
