Learn More Four Second Frenzy is a cool puzzle game where you have to complete an endless array of challenges. As you've already guessed, each puzzle/challenge lasts four seconds – the puzzles are different and cover a wide range of themes and skill requirements. For example, in one jigsaw puzzle you need to mark a cow, and in another you need to quickly park the car. This game requires quick thinking and reflexes and you need to read quickly and use your brain to figure out what you have to do in a split second. You can only use keyboard arrow keys and spacebars that narrow down how you can complete challenges, but you can still fight! You will find this game both challenging and frustrating, but also a huge amount of fun so take on the four-second madness today! Release date November 15, 2007 Developer Four Second Frenzy is being developed by John Cooney (aka jmtb02) in collaboration with other artists. Features of the 50 playable levels 3 game modes Quick response and attention to detail are required in each level of Platform Controls Use the arrow keys and spacing bar for the game. Eh. Good time waster, but certainly not much of a puzzle. If someone only has 4 seconds to figure out what they're looking at, what they should do and then do it, you can certainly bet they'll optimize speed as much as they can. Nevertheless, many games actively go against intuition and players for using speed. Strange schedules, schedules, and turns, unspecified directions when to press keys, etc. If someone has such a short time to do things anyway, the least useful thing you can do is make them wait even longer to check their thought process about what's actually going on. A great way to improve is not to kill a player for mistakes or scoring in fact, but only for time running out. Second, make songs and games more linear and simpler, with more obvious intentions to process. As it stands, it's less of a puzzle and more of a game skill.
