Cohabitation agreement alberta template

A cohabitation agreement is a legal document in Alberta between two people in a common law relationship, or what's legally referred to as an 'adult interdependent relationship'. It follows many of the same principles of a 'prenuptial agreement'. Cohabitation agreements set out all the rights and obligations of two people whose relationship can be classified as adult interdependent. Most commonly these agreements decide who gets what and pays for what in the event of a break up. However they can set out rights and obligations during the relationship as well. For instance, they outline how shared assets will be distributed in the event of a separation between common law partners. Or they decide terms within a relationship such as who pays for what, who is responsible for what, who owns what, and so on. Who can have a cohabitation agreement? Under Alberta law, you must be in an 'Adult Interdependent Relationship' to be eligible for cohabitation agreements. Sometimes this is referred to as a common law relationship (however this term no longer has legal distinction). Qualification is determined by the Adult Interdependent Relationships Act, which says you are in an adult interdependent relationship if you meet the following conditions: Adult Interdependence Designation "relationship of interdependence" means a relationship outside marriage in which any 2 persons:(i) share one another's lives, (ii) are emotionally committed to one another, and (iii) function as an economic and domestic unit. You are considered to be in a adult interdependence relationship if you have fulfilled the above requirements and if: (a) the person has lived with the other person in a relationship of interdependence (i) for a continuous period of not less than 3 years, or (ii) of some permanence, if there is a child of the relationship by birth or adoption,or A Cohabitation Agreement is commonly used when an unmarried couple decides to start living together. A simple agreement should generally have at least the following: Who are two people living together and entering into the agreement What the agreement covers, including how bills and other expenses will be split; lists of joint and separate property; and how property will be divided if the relationship ends Where the agreement is being executed and which state laws apply When the agreement takes effect, either when both move in or at the time of signing Why certain properties should be considered separate or jointly owned How the parties want to divide and dispose of any and all property in the future. Table of Contents 1. What is a Cohabitation Agreement? A Cohabitation Agreement, or a Living Together Agreement, is a written contract used by unmarried couples who live together that describes their financial obligations during the relationship and after it ends. In particular, the agreement addresses: what happens to property you acquired before the relationship if you one of you passes away unexpectedly how jointly owned property and property acquired during the relationship will be divided if you no longer remain a couple how living expenses will be shared any other financial or general expectations you want to put in writing before moving in together During the relationship, this agreement can be useful in describing how you and your partner will handle your day-to-day finances, including how you will divide rent, mortgage, and bill payments. The agreement can also set out which partner owns what — and in what proportion — and allows you to agree on how your property (including personal items, savings, and other assets) will be split if the relationship breaks down. Signing an agreement might not be the top item on your list when you decide to move in with your partner, but it can prevent a lot of emotional and financial turmoil should the relationship turn sour. A simple agreement will contain the following basic elements: Effective Date: when does the agreement take effect Full Disclosure: you must agree that, before signing the agreement, you both had the opportunity to examine your partner's financial situation, including net worth, assets, holdings, income, and liabilities Independent Legal Advice: the courts will only uphold the agreement if you both had the opportunity to consult with qualified legal counsel before signing the agreement Agreement on Payment of Expenses: before moving in together, decide how the rent or mortgage payments, utilities, groceries, and other regular expenses are going to be divided Lists of Separate and Joint Property: list property you acquired before becoming a couple and want to keep as separate property—including financial assets, household goods, vehicles, and other items. Similarly, list property owned jointly with your partner as joint property, which will be divided between the two of you upon death or separation. Effect of Separation or Death: any property that is listed as "separate" in the living together agreement generally will not be shared with the other person if a death or separation occurs. In contrast, any property listed as "joint" will be shared with the other person. If you want your partner to have inheritance rights, you should clarify this wish in a will. Effect of Marriage: clearly spells out whether the agreement continues in effect, ends upon marriage, or will be revised before marriage. Generally, the law does not provide for inheritance rights for unmarried couples who live together. As a reference, this document is known by other names: Common Law Partner Agreement Cohabitation Agreement for Unmarried Partners No-Nuptial Agreement Cohabitation Agreement PDF Sample The sample cohabitation agreement below details an agreement between the two parties, 'Eddie M Penny' and 'Meryl R Paul.' The two parties agree to live together at the same property, despite no current plans to marry. 2. Is a Cohabitation Agreement Right for You? Cohabitation Agreements are used when parties explicitly agree not to be married, and they do not want to be bound by state or federal laws regarding "common law marriage," where a couple lives together long enough to be considered married by the government. Since the law generally grants no legal status to cohabitating couples who are not married or civil partners, this agreement is a way to determine the partners' rights and obligations during the course of the relationship and afterwards. Nine states, however, do allow you create an informal or common law marriage if the following three apply: You both agree to be married You both live together as a married couple after agreeing to be married You hold yourselves out to the public as a married couple Informal or common-law marriages can be entered into in these states: Alabama, Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Montana, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, and Utah. You should use a living together agreement when you and your partner know you will live together for a long time, but do not want to get married. An agreement allows you both to confirm whether property will be characterized as separate (or joint) property for legal purposes and prepares both partners to think about how future property and/or income might be divided in the future. Always disclose everything in your possession or for which you are liable. Many states will not otherwise honor this agreement. Cohabitation agreements typically cannot make any future arrangements concerning children of the marriage, either. While similar to a prenuptial agreement, a Cohabitation Agreement Form is not the same as a prenuptial agreement. A prenuptial is used only when two people are considering marriage. In fact, many states have laws that will not honor a prenuptial agreement in if the couple decides not to marry after all. If you live with your same-sex partner and dasso not want to get married, this Huffington Post article explains why you might need a living together Agreement. Living together agreements very often have major tax consequences upon each person in the relationship. It is important to seek out competent legal and tax advice on any questions you may run across. 3. Consequences of Not Using a Cohabitation Agreement Without a Cohabitation Agreement, you could be forced to assume the debts of your partner if you split up. That means you could be on the hook not only for outstanding rent and utility payments but also debts relating to household goods and personal items. This agreement can also help ensure that any assets you acquired prior to the relationship stay in your possession if the relationship ends. Living together does not create a contractual relationship by itself, nor does it grant you a property settlement (or inheritance) should you break up or if one of you passes away unexpectedly. If the relationship ends for any reason, the result can be quite messy and expensive. Parties who live together without the benefit of marriage and enter into major property transactions like investing in real estate together are at risk of losing any interest they have in the property, particularly if one person enters into a transaction without their partner's consent or involvement. Some states will give de facto marital rights to couples living together with certain characteristics or after a certain period of time. Unfortunately, this can be detrimental to couples who assume each of their assets and or debts will remain forever separate. As a reminder, each party should seek independent legal counsel before executing this agreement since you might be waiving rights you would otherwise be entitled to in a common-law marriage.
