The illustrations were great and classic Carle, though; I think my favorite was the green lion :- I guess I would give the story itself is probably be best suited to younger children. Then, on top of the homage facade, there's the claim on the cover flap that the book might just "give all children confidence in their own creativity" because they can feel free to make crocodiles, polar bears, donkeys and such any of color they want. I realize the two are rather interrelated as Marc influenced Carle, but I just found the story itself very lackluster and it did not, to me, show any sort of storytelling magic or biographical usefulness.
