This will sound appallingly narcissistic, but that book explained me to myself, in a way that nothing I'd ever read had done before.

It was my introduction to existentialism, and, in a sense, it was directly responsible for the creation of Howard the Duck. Deuteronomy is a creature half-id and half-superego, while Iprah is an all-ego promoter of self-indulgent pop psychology. Considering her dangerous, Gabriel sends the cherub Thrasher to resurrect Sigmund Freud, whose cigar blasts out half of Thrasher's brains being immortal, this just makes him act drunk. Iprah destroys Freud, but Howard blasts her with the cigar, separating her from Deuteronomy. Puffing on the cigar, Howard disintegrates and arrives in Hell. Sometime later, Howard attempts to register under the Superhero Registration Act during the superhero Civil War , but learns his socially disrupted life has created so many bureaucratic headaches that the government's official policy is that Howard does not exist. This lack of government oversight delights him: "For the rest of my life, no more parking tickets, or taxes, or jury duty. Heck, I couldn't even vote if I wanted to! After he defeats the supervillain M.

Howard the Duck is briefly seen as part of the superpowered army gathered to battle invading Skrull forces. During the Fear Itself storyline, Howard forms a team called the Fearsome Four with She-Hulk, Frankenstein's Monster and Nighthawk to stop the Man-Thing when he goes on a rampage in Manhattan, due to the fear and chaos he senses on the citizens. They later discover a plot by Psycho-Man to use the Man-Thing's volatile empathy to create a weapon. They promote S. Jonah Jameson. Spider-Man later interrupts a S. Spidey escapes with Howard and breaks his brainwashing when Beverly is threatened. Howard quickly explains S. As Spider-Man publicly announces his long-standing support for S.

Howard is able to break through to Beverly, reminding her of their past together. The Supreme S. Spidey attacks the S. Howard states that he believes S. Because of his experience with zombie-infested worlds and his leadership of Machine Man, Howard is chosen as the leader of, as he dubs them, the Ducky Dozen. The team is composed of him, several Golden Age heroes, Dum-Dum Dugan , and Battlestar , who is also a veteran of a zombie incident. Upon entering Earth, the Ducky Dozen fight hordes of zombie Nazis and Asgardians , but suffer grave losses as the team's members are either killed or zombified during the battle. After successfully accomplishing their mission, Howard, Dugan, Taxi Taylor and Battlestar are the only members to survive and return to Earth along with the Riveter, the only survivor of Earth's resistance team, the Suffragists.

They beat the horde back with nothing but a broken sword, a rubber chicken with nails in it and a gun that shoots bees. After the death of Uatu the Watcher and the activation of the secrets buried in his eye, Howard discovers that he has the potential to be the most intelligent being in Duckworld. After evading a squirrel while driving, he is thrown flying from his vehicle but uses his intellect to calculate a way to land safely in a nearby dumpster. Howard returns to his business as a private eye, working in the same building as She-Hulk, in Brooklyn. One of his first new clients is Jonathan Richards, who hires Howard to retrieve a necklace stolen by the Black Cat. With the help of Tara Tam, his new friend and assistant, Howard manages to recover the necklace.

However, on his way to give it back to Richards, he finds himself kidnapped by the Collector and allied with the Guardians of the Galaxy to escape the villain, who was attempting to add Howard to his collection of rare space objects and entities. Upon returning to Earth, Howard is robbed by May Parker , Spider-Man's aunt, and later re-encounters the Ringmaster, who is revealed to have brainwashed the elderly into committing robberies. After recovering the necklace for a third time, Howard is approached by Richards in the middle of his fight against the Ringmaster and Richards reveals himself to be Talos the Untamed, who reveals that the necklace was part of a marginally powerful item known as the Abundant Glove.

With help from Doctor Strange, Howard and Tara locate the final piece of the Abundant Glove, but are unable to put it back together when Talos grabs it and proceeds to use it to wreak havoc on the city. Talos is confronted by numerous heroes while Howard and Tara take cover. Howard is able to point out that Tara, who is revealed to possess shapeshifting powers similar to that of a Skrull, could help him defeat Talos. Talos is later apprehended by the Fantastic Four and everything returns to normal. Howard has no superhuman powers, but he is skilled in the martial art known as Quak-Fu, enough to defeat, or at least to hold his own against, far larger opponents.

He has shown some degree of mystic talent in the past, to the point that Stephen Strange taught some spells to Howard and even offered to train him, but Howard declined. On one occasion, Howard used a suit of powered armor known as the "Iron Duck" armor designed by Claude Starkowitz. Besides its property as body armor, the suit was equipped with foot-mounted leaping coils, a chest-mounted searchlight, and flamethrowers in both arms. Howard the Duck is a three-foot-tall anthropomorphic duck. He generally wears a tie and shirt and is almost always found smoking a cigar. Originally, like many cartoon ducks, he wore no pants; Disney threatened legal action due to Howard's resemblance to Donald Duck , [88] and Marvel redesigned that aspect of the character by writing into the script that Howard was the target of anti-nudity protests, and was forced to do business with "Wally Sidney", a failed cartoonist who made his fortune through a chain of conservative clothing retailers known as "Sidney World".

Howard tries on various outfits, including ones akin to Donald Duck's sailor uniform and Uncle Scrooge 's coat and top hat , before settling on his new attire of a business suit complete with trousers. Although Howard sulks that he has lost, Beverly reassures him that she does not want him to be a victim of a mob, and loves him no matter what he wears. Howard has an irritable and cynical attitude towards the often bizarre events around him; he feels there is nothing special about him except that he is a duck, and though he has no goals other than seeking comfort and to be left alone, he is often dragged into dangerous adventures simply because he is visibly unusual. His series' tagline, "Trapped in a world he never made", played off the genre trappings of s science fiction. His near-constant companion and occasional girlfriend is former art model and Cleveland native Beverly Switzler.

Like Howard, Beverly wants an ordinary life but is frequently singled out for her appearance, though as a beautiful woman rather than a duck. Howard has worked with Spider-Man and the Man-Thing on various occasions. Howard found himself on Earth due to a shift in the "Cosmic Axis" from a world similar to Earth, but where there are "more ducks" and "apes don't talk. In , Gerber dismissed this idea, calling it "very pedestrian" and 'comic-booky' — in the worst sense of the term. Gerber later depicted his character Destroyer Duck as existing in such a world. His antagonists who usually appear in a single story each are often parodies of science fiction , fantasy , or horror characters, as well as frequent parodies of political figures and organizations. The chief recurring villain, Lester Verde, better known as Doctor Bong — modeled on Doctor Doom and writers Bob Greene and Lester Bangs — is a former tabloid reporter who has the power to "reorder reality" by smashing himself on the bell -shaped helmet on his head and his main goal is to marry Beverly.

Beverly eventually agreed to marry him to save Howard from Bong's evil experimentation, but the two were divorced shortly thereafter. Doctor Bong would reappear in issues of She-Hulk and Deadpool in the mids. Other recurring villains include the Kidney Lady, an older woman who has been convinced by her former lover that the soul is in the kidneys and attacks anything she sees as a threat to them, and Reverend Jun Moon Yuc and his Yuccies, a parody of Reverend Sun Myung Moon and the Unification Church "Moonies". Another important villain was the organization S. Omega the Unknown appeared to him in a dream, as did Spider-Man and the founding members of the rock group Kiss on other occasions. In the miniseries, as a mocking gesture toward Disney's mascot Mickey Mouse and as a reference to a previous lawsuit with the company over Howard's similarity to Donald Duck, Howard was turned into various other animals, but primarily appeared in the series as an anthropomorphic mouse.

This character is featured in its own one-shot comic book which like almost all of the other Amalgam Comics "falsely" implied that the one-shot was a continuation of multiple other, pre-existing Lobo The Duck stories. In the letters page of Bat-Thing 1, there was mention of a fictional upcoming 'special issue' featuring Howard the Mxyzptlk, presumably a merging of Howard with Mister Mxyzptlk. An alternate version of Howard the Duck becomes infected with the zombie plague, and eats the brains of the alternate-Ash that is native to the zombie version of the Marvel Universe. In the Marvel Comics 2 universe, Howard is seen as a blindfold-wearing martial arts teacher, a reference harkening back to his mastery of "Quack Fu" in the original s series.

Duck is the President of the United States. In a parody of the Spider-Verse event, Howard and Leo Fitz team up with a group of Howards from across the Multiverse who collectively call themselves the Legion of Howards. This version of Howard is brought to Cleveland by a laser spectroscope experiment gone awry and befriends rock singer Beverly Switzler. Between June 6, and October 29, , Howard the Duck appeared in a syndicated daily comic strip that comic strip historian Allan Holtz has described as having low distribution and that was eventually replaced by the Incredible Hulk comic strip.

When the strip was dropped by the Cleveland Plain Dealer , a Cleveland TV station began televising the strip for two minutes each night. A total of eleven story arcs, as well as a number of single-joke strips, constitute the individual strips that were printed. These were followed by an adaptation of the "Sleep of the Just" story from issue 4 of the Marvel comic, scripted by Gerber and illustrated by Alan Kupperberg. Gerber was fired from the strip in early over chronic problems with deadlines. In November , the first of a projected eight-issue series reprinting the entire strip was published by John Zawadzki. Titled It's Adventure Time With Howard the Duck , only the initial issue was published. In , a pilot for a radio show version of Howard was recorded. James Belushi played the role of Howard, although the program was never aired.

Michael Burkett of the Orange County Register described Howard the Duck as a "cantankerous, stogie-chomping, nattily dressed" antihero with an "acerbic wit, irascible personality and down-and-dirty street smarts" that distinguished him from other cartoon animal characters. Marvel editor-in-chief Roy Thomas thought that Howard, as a "funny animal" character, was inappropriate for the horror comic book in which he was introduced. He told Gerber to dispose of the character "as fast as you can. One fan even sent in a duck carcass to make his point. At San Diego Comic-Con , the auditorium stood up and applauded when a fan asked Thomas if Howard would ever come back. Marvel responded by bringing Howard back for more appearances and soon launching his own self-titled comic book series.

The Howard the Duck comic book has been described as "the first successful title aimed at an older audience. After Gerber parted ways with Marvel in amid numerous legal and creative disputes, and other writers took over for him, Howard the Duck's popularity diminished rapidly. Stan Lee , Shooter and Gerber himself criticized the post-Gerber stories for their lack of substance and clever humor. Within three years of Gerber's departure, Marvel had ceased publishing new Howard the Duck material.

Lucasfilm's big-budget Howard the Duck movie disappointed critics, audiences and the character's fans alike. Although Marvel has occasionally released new Howard comic books, some written by Gerber, and sometimes features the character in other media, Howard's popularity has never again approached what it was in the s. I love Howard the Duck. The original series was original, edgy, and something that most mainstream comic books never reached…then Howard the Duck who was created as a joke became a real joke with the Howard the Duck movie. With the return of Howard in Guardians of the Galaxy , Howard has some hope…and Zdarsky manages to recapture some of that original Howard the Duck inane style. The series manages to both be kind of canon and a farce at the same time. You have extreme versions of characters like Spider-Man who bemoans his failures all the time and you have Howard going up against real villains…but they are villains that mostly fit the context of the character.

The issues that are the most fun in this collection revolve around Beverly Switzler. In the s, Beverly was ditsy and an unfocused dingbat… something rather un-PC now. Zdarsky does a good job bridging the gap between the original Beverly and the Lea Thompson Beverly by giving Beverly a real goal and depth. The inclusion of Lea Thompson does poke fun at the movie and gives the series the weird reflexive-ness it needs to rise above a simple parody of superhero comics.

Howard reunites with Beverley Switlzer, only to then run into Lea Thompson, the actress who played her in that god-awful movie. Then he finds out that everything in his life is totally out of his control thanks to Mojo and aliens. It's hilarious, totally off the wall, and then it kicks you in the stomach and rams feelings down your throat too, because why the hell not. Howard's book is one that you could easily dismiss, but you'd be missing out on so much fun. Joe Quinones' artwork is lovely, it sells all of Chip Zdarsky's zany jokes, and this is just a book you really should be reading. Dec 04, Brandon Forsyth rated it it was ok. This got super-meta super-fast, and while I applaud Zdarksy's willingness to make himself and Marvel look like total asshats, the story as a whole really doesn't come together. Howard gets a sweet ending that doesn't really feel deserved after all the team-ups and superteams of the past ten issues have taken the focus away from him.

If you're intrigued by this character, just read the volume zero stuff and you'll get the best of this run. Zdarksy really took the character to some wonderful places there, but it feels like he only had about five issues in him and is very upfront in his final issue letter that he fully expected to get cancelled after issue one. All that being said, I think the time is right for Howard to return - I think Trump's America could use a pessimistic alien who has to learn to co-exist with the other and build real connection with those he can't stand.

I wasn't sure about the reality that intrudes on, uh, reality, but when I saw the window thrown wide open to have TWO Biggs-es, Biggs and Biggs Prime, I saw the genius of it and felt that, perhaps for the first time, the 4th wall was broken with good purpose.

I'll miss this series. It was so goofy but not without heart. The art was great. All of it worked. Even when you had s The end of the series?
